Those of you who know me know what a personal ordeal writing this research report has been for me. I do not say that in usual sense that it was intellectually and professionally challenging, which it was, but I refer rather to the overarching yet unrelated personal crisis that just happened to occur congruently with doing the research for and writing this research report, and very nearly caused me to abandon my studies.

I thank first to those people who have helped me personally, provided care, help, support and love: Renee who has been a constant source of encouragement and of emotional support when I was beyond caring, my sister Margaret who has reminded me that I need to be living for myself rather than others. My friends Deborah, Danny, Tom, Brent, Emeritta, and the others who have been there when I needed them. Geof, who opened my eyes to the path of self-annihilation that I had embarked. Myriam for simply being Myriam.

I also owe a huge debt to my supervisors, Stefanie and Robert, who have been patient and understanding with my sporadic progress on this research and the additional time that I have required to complete it.

The Heaney family who have been extremely tolerant of my random visits to Johannesburg to occupy their guest room for several days at a time; more than tolerant really, but welcoming.

Finally my parent's remarkable patience and continued support during this time.

Abstract:

The author describes and discusses children's social welfare in Cape Town, South Africa, particularly in light of faith/religiosity as a motivating factor for charitable actions and activity among individuals and organisations. He outlines the general environment in which organisations are operating, draws a number of Faith Based as well as Secular organisations and individuals into the discussion, and describes the way in which religion and beliefs influence, moderate, and guide these groups in their daily routines and overreaching objectives and goals. The author will illustrate the central role that religion and religiosity play both in the initial impetus to become involved with Child Social Welfare as well as the role that it plays in retaining both staff and volunteers within this industry. Further, the author will demonstrate the ways in which religious ideology impacts upon and informs the ideology and policy of the distinct organisations which are discussed here in an attempt to demonstrate the ways in which religious ideology interacts both internally within the organisations and externally informing their relationship with those around them. Finally the author will describe the way in which religion influences and impacts on the children that are being raised and care for by these organisations, examining the way in which individual organisations ideologies and religious positioning changes the children's upbringing and the goals that they have for the future of the children.

Chapter 1 Introduction

The children here are very challenging, they didn't trust adults very easily, so it really takes some hard work and some initiative to build up the customer relationship, but I think they need a lot of attention, I think they need to feel loved and accepted in spite of everything else, I think it's very important that they know that you accept them and care for them in spite of the fact that they have lived on the street, in spite of the fact that they are taking glue and using dagga, that it's important that you don't say well the child is bad because of what he is doing. I think you'd rather say the behaviour is bad. You know, and I think that you really go out and look for the positive in this child, because all you have is the positive.

Yinzani Drop in Centre and Homestead Children's Shelter

My first real experience in the lives of those who work with children, and made substantial sacrifices to help children was with an organisation that will not otherwise appear in this research report. This is because this experience is substantially removed in both time and space from my fieldwork in Cape Town and it does not have an overt religious aspect. In the north eastern South African province of Mpumalanga, not far from the Kruger National Park, there nestled among the lush green rolling mountains that make up that part of South Africa's landscape there is a farm. This farm is owned by a woman who I will refer to as Sharon. The first time I arrived at her home I was quite taken aback; the smell of pigs mingling with the mud and compost, what appeared at first glance to be a rundown old farmhouse, and a swarm of children seeming to be utterly out of control. Having had a long drive from Johannesburg the day before, and being severely hung over, it was all rather more than I was prepared to cope with early on a Friday morning. The first person I met was one of Sharon's sons, Jack. A very thin man with more hair than I'd seen on one person in quite some time he brought me into the yard proper and offered me a joint. I was introduced to the others around; Sharon's other son Dave as well as her daughter Beth and a large Zimbabwean man by the name of Nathan who seemed to be a permanent fixture around the table on the stoep. I was also introduced the monkeys, some species of lemur I recall, the male of the group who immediately pissed on me through the bars of his cage, and I got the tour of the farmhouse. Little children everywhere, Sharon's three youngest grandchildren and the children in her care all playing and making a ruckus. It was school holidays I was told, this is why they were all about (my first thought having being 'Christ, why aren't these kids in school, what is wrong with these people'). The large five room brick and concrete house was packed full with toys and clothes and all the things that are needed for children. Coming in off the stoep we entered the main sitting room, with the large dormitory style sleeping room containing beds, the television and a computer off to the left. A kitchen, bathroom and second small bedroom made up the rest of the house.

First impressions are often quite deceiving. I quickly discovered as I spent time with this family of carers and the children that were their wards just how much work they put into them on a daily basis. The stress and worry that went into making sure that they were fed and clothed and schooled and loved. Every few days Sharon would take her kombi-van into Barberton to one of the local grocery stores where the owner donated the food which could not be sold and loaded it full of everything that she could, to be sorted back at the house. This trip was not always easy; in the time that I was there she more than once had to ask other people for petrol money so she could make the trip. I accompanied her to the Township north of her farm where she had to buy electricity, sixty rands, or three days worth, at a time so the kids wouldn't go through an entire month's budget in a week. Daily trips to the local pawpaw farm which donated as many unmarketable papaws as Sharon could fit in her van, some of which went to feed the children, the rest to feed the pigs. Every morning the household would wake up to tea and a breakfast of toast and whatever else was available. The morning consisted of errands, trips to town if needed, trips to the pawpaw farm and other tasks that needed to be done. The day would continue and Sharon would prepare lunch; the children helped with the preparation of rice or pap and the cleaning and cutting of vegetable while Sharon handled the cooking over an open fire in the yard, one pot for the adults who ate on the stoep, and another for the children who mostly ate in the accompanying house. While I was there we had an abundance of meat and tomatoes and onions, these things being in season, and the main meal was a relish like stew made of these ingredients, with pawpaw salad for desert. Food was not always so plentiful, and at times one of her son's or Nathan would hunt in the bush to provide extra meat.

When not working on feeding the children, the various adults of the house occupied themselves with other tasks. Jack was in the process of building a wood fired oven in the yard and also made jewellery to sell through a number of shops in the area. Dave when not taking the boys into the bush to gather firewood or hikes to clear poacher's snares was forever working on his rickshaw project which he was certain would revolutionise tourism and urban transport in Port Elizabeth. When not teaching the kids how to build cars out of cans and wire, Nathan seemed to be working on setting up a local hostel/tourist attraction. Nathan however is the type of character where you can never be sure what is fact or fiction. Even after the week I spent there I am not entirely sure he was actually from Zimbabwe, and I certainly have no idea what his real background or life was like. The only two things I am reasonably sure about is that he did, at some point, have parents and that he smokes a great deal of dagga.

1.0 Introduction

I came to South Africa with a different question in mind than the one that I find myself answering here. I was motivated by having seen a documentary about the grandmothers and older women in the South African townships who had to take responsibility for their grandchildren when the children's own parents had died, often from HIV/Aids related illnesses. Some of these women had further taken in other children from the community who had no one else to care for them, a dozen or more in a home not being uncommon. With the desire to write my masters in anthropology and a curiosity for what seemed to my Canadian mind an amazing act of generosity, a downright selfless act on the part of many of these women, I packed my bags for Johannesburg and took a place in the masters program at the University of the Witwatersrand. I had intentions to find as many of these women as I could and really get to understand what it is that made them care for these children; I had no idea what I was getting myself into. I later came to realize that the very premise of my search was flawed. Of course people took care of their grandchildren, caring for family is a common trait across cultures, and it is a common practice in Southern Africa for women to rear their grandchildren.<sup>1</sup> As to how they were able to do so? The same way they managed living before, one day at a time. In my pursuit of these grandmothers that I had come to South Africa to study I however began to encounter other organisations and people who were reaching out to children whom others could or would not; organisations trying to reach those who had no one else to help them, for reasons entirely beyond kin or community.

Through this change in interests I came to encounter Sharon and spend a week on her farm as I described above, and found myself fascinated by her and those like her.

So I instead came to focus on a segment of the population that is truly challenging to all those who work with them. My research shifted to look at those organisations that deal almost exclusively with street children and children who have been statutorily removed from their homes or communities for reasons of poverty, neglect, abuse or unmanageability. These organisations, being primarily smaller grassroots and local non-government organisations, do deal with other orphans and vulnerable children, but the ones selected for this research deal with these more difficult cases as their primary care group. The question that then came to mind was what motivated these individuals and groups to work with these children who many other people wish would hurry up and die, or at least not bother them for change at the traffic lights.<sup>2</sup>

1.1 Objectives and Structure

Having reviewed the literature of orphans and vulnerable children and faith based organisations in general and with regards to those operating in Cape Town it has become apparent that 1) there is little written on the topic of faith based children's homes and charities in South Africa and that 2) what is written is from sociological, political science, pedagogy or related fields, and that there is nothing from an anthropological perspective on the topic in South Africa, and 3) that while there are some claims by organisations that religion or faith act as

<sup>2</sup> I was first introduced to the Afrikaans curse voetsek by a man sitting next to me at a café where street children often approached those sitting outside. His conversation went something like this 'Ach don't talk to them they only want money. You must tell them to voetsek and if they still bother you give them a smack. Open hand, if you punch you might break the skin and you could get aids' motivators among their staff, there is little written by way of measuring religiosity and belief within the organisations.

This research has focus primarily on the three following questions:

- 1) What roles do religion and faith play in motivating people to work with orphans and vulnerable children in Cape Town?
- 2) What role do religion and religiosity play in the activities and lives of the individuals who are involved with faith based child welfare programs in Cape Town?
- 3) What, if any, common factors can be found between the individuals who are involved with orphans and vulnerable children and the organisations that care for them?

This research has been concerned primarily with those people who have made a major commitment to children's social welfare, being involved in the industry full time as their daily activity, usually employed at or a full time volunteer at one of the various children's social welfare organisations in the city. They are often individuals who have sacrificed opportunities with greater economic and/or social rewards to continue in this field and have made other personal sacrifices to be able to continue with their work.

As the activities of many of the larger faith based organisations and non-government organisations span entire continents it would be a scholarly travesty to attempt to generalise broadly from these organisations. There are however a number of smaller local groups that operate in Cape Town and are run primarily by people who have strong ties to the city. These organisations can give a much more accurate picture of the local influences and attitudes that are involved with both faith based organisations and secular organisations dealing with orphans and vulnerable children. Further, given other literature dealing with the various topics surrounding orphans and vulnerable children and drawing on my own experience and observations, it is possible to generalise on a local level.

This research report is structured to provide as much as possible a logical and intuitive discussion of the topics surrounding the questions posed. This chapter will continue to introduce the subject and provide relevant details to situate the reader. Chapter 2 is to be a discussion of Social Welfare both in South Africa and internationally, outlining some of the current theory and philosophy on the subject. It will aid to further situate the reader with regards to the topic and prepare them for a site specific discussion on the subject. Chapter 3 will deal with the methodology of the research, discussing the reasoning behind the particular groups I have chosen to work with and provide a discussion of the various ethnographic data collection strategies that I have used in this research. Chapter 4 is a historical look at both faith based organisations as well as, secular organisations operating in Cape Town. It will examine historical activities faith based organisations in Cape Town and further expand on their interactions and involvement with orphans and vulnerable children. Chapter 5 will examine the concept of good children: what are good children and what goes into raising them. Chapter 6 is a review of the nature of religion in the home, examining the influence of religion on the running and environment of the homes. Finally chapter 7 will conclude this research report, drawing together the disparate arguments and demonstrating the ways in which belief and religion serve to motivate the individuals in question.

1.2 Problem Statement

After nearly 15 years of free democratic rule at the time of this research; South Africa is experiencing a very significant problem meeting the needs of its orphans and vulnerable children. White South Africa has been previously regarded as a ‘first world’ or developed nation. In the 1970’s the population of Cape Town enjoying a standard of living superior to that of California’s. Yet today the numbers of orphans and vulnerable children, as defined by Tsheko among others as “A vulnerable child is a child who is either orphaned or is living in crisis situations due to multiple causes”<sup>3</sup> is high, and in many cases the conditions under which they exist are extremely harsh.

Most societies have struggled at times to deal with numbers of orphans, homeless or otherwise vulnerable and disadvantaged children. Given the current number of such children in South Africa a study of children’s social welfare and those involved in it is long overdue. The current projections put the number of orphans in South Africa at 1.8 million, with the projections for 2015 of over 2.5 million.<sup>4</sup> For a nation of 45 million this represents 2.5 percent of the population, and we can only begin to guess the impact that these demographic shifts are going to have on society. The need to accommodate such numbers of orphans and vulnerable children has not been faced before in a society that has the infrastructure and resources to make a serious effort to address the problem, and it presents a unique set of challenges to a nation that is still undergoing significant social and economic changes since it’s democratization in 1994. What is present in South Africa that is absent from other nations facing similar crises is that South Africa possesses both a well established, if inadequate welfare infrastructure<sup>5</sup> and the presence of many non-government organisations that are occupied with child social welfare, both local and international, secular and faith based.

Cape Town Child Welfare

2.0 Children's Social Welfare in Cape Town: A glance at policy and practice

Children are addressed by the South African Constitution, Chapter 2 'Bill of Rights,' Section 28 'Children.' Of particular interest are items b through e, which deal explicitly with the issues that are most commonly encountered by many of those who work in children's social welfare. This section reads:

1. Every child has the right
  - a. to a name and a nationality from birth;
  - b. to family care or parental care, or to appropriate alternative care when removed from the family environment;
  - c. to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services;
  - d. to be protected from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation;
  - e. to be protected from exploitative labour practices;

2. A child's best interests are of paramount importance in every matter concerning the child.
3. In this section "child" means a person under the age of 18 years.<sup>6</sup>

It echoes the African National Congress' The Children's Charter of South Africa<sup>7</sup> in its content, which is in turn based closely on the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, ratified in 1995 in South Africa following the commencement of democratic governance in this country. For the purposes of this research the most important points to draw from this bill of rights are “b. to family care or parental care, or to appropriate alternative care when removed from the family environment” and “c. to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services.” In accordance with the article 4 of the United Nations convention on the rights of children, it is the government’s responsibility to ensure that all children have these two things, which is where foster care and other children’s social welfare projects come into play.

The issue of children’s social welfare is further developed in the Social Welfare White Paper of 1997. The South African White Papers are a collection of documents published by the government of South Africa outlining current policy. Their publication under the current government began in 1994 and has continued since then. They focus on the various challenges that South Africa encounters, particularly those relating to public services such as education, social welfare, corrections, the use of natural resources, energy issues, the land bank, and any other concern that is primarily the government’s responsibility. Published in August of 1997, the Social Welfare White Paper set forth a number of requirements for organisations operating in the Social Welfare field, particularly but not limited to those receiving public funding. Both government and civil society<sup>8</sup> (private) organisations are required to address the concerns and follow the guidelines and objectives that are outlined in the white papers. Different organisations among those I have studied have a number of responses to the white papers; from working hard to meet and set out guidelines by which the objectives of the papers can be met, to being only vaguely aware of the white papers as something that they should probably look into. As might be expected the larger organisations that are more heavily funded by government grants are more familiar with and adhere more closely to the white papers guidelines than smaller organisations which tend to be more independent.

There are two particularly interesting aspects of the Social Welfare White Paper as it relates to the delivery of social welfare to children. 1) is the admission that the government of South Africa does not have the resources to increase or improve the social welfare system<sup>9</sup> and 2) that the government will have to involve civil society as a major partner in the social welfare restructuring project of the nation.<sup>10</sup> This has come to mean that non-government organisations have borne much of the effort in working with orphans and vulnerable children in South Africa.

With the release of the Social Welfare White Paper there were a number of major changes that occurred in the child welfare sector. Since the transition in 1994 to a democratic nation required then that all children would henceforth be treated equally regardless of race, there was a need to address the woefully inadequate welfare systems that were in place to assist the non-white population in South Africa. Without additional resources, and with the massive restructuring of government organisations in general at this time, there was a great deal uncertainty and confusion as to how to best address the new environment that welfare workers and organisations found themselves in.<sup>11</sup> The older, more firmly established and well funded organisations were instrumental in developing a new strategy for the care of orphans and vulnerable children, meeting the significant challenges that existed in this changing environment. They used their experience in the field of children's social welfare to develop the procedures and strategies to enable them to operate within the governments mandates with the limited resources at their disposal, essentially to serve the children's needs as best they can.

As residential care has become unfashionable in most other parts of the world, primarily because it remains both expensive and has been demonstrated to be not in the best interest of the child developmentally,<sup>12</sup> a foster care and family and early intervention and community upliftment model was adopted by the more successful child social welfare organisations. Cape Town Child Welfare in particular credits itself with developing community and family based upliftment and development projects that aim to help vulnerable children before there becomes a need for statutory intervention. Cape Town Child Welfare alone manages eight separate projects geared towards reducing the numbers of children at risk, most notably their Thembalabantwana, Isolobabantwana, Child Protection, Job Skills and Educare Training, and managing foster care placement and adoption in Cape Town. These reflect primarily preventative measures aimed at reducing the need for statutory removals and foster placements by improving the community, the situation of the parent and maintaining surveillance on potential problem cases, thus reducing the overall load on the system. Other organizations have followed suit with community based programs; Ons Plek maintains a children's afterschool program in Philippi for children identified to be high risk; Home from Home, a crèche in Khayelitsha for all the children in the area of their foster homes; and Homestead, a daytime drop in centre for street children in the City Centre as well as a beadwork project to empower communities. In this way these organizations have been able to address the needs of many more children and fit within the guidelines set out by the government to operate on a community level.

2.1 Faith based organisations in South Africa

The prevalence of faith based organisations in social welfare is well documented, and has historical precedence. Faith based organisations were the primary social security net in the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom until after World War 1 when the 1930's depression spurred the creation of government funded and administered welfare systems.

Faith based organisations in South Africa began with missionaries who came as part of the colonial forces to South Africa. One of the earliest faith based organisations in Cape Town was Nazareth House, founded in 1881 by a small group of the Sisters of Nazareth. Their mandate to found a mission and to care for the elderly and orphans who were not otherwise able to care for themselves.<sup>13</sup> They offered the first residential care in Cape Town, and are further credited with being the first residential care facility in South Africa to accept HIV positive babies and children. They continue to operate residential care and foster style care for children, as well as residential care for a number of elderly patients.

Chevrah Kadisha, better known as Jewish Community Services, has a history in South Africa nearly as long as that of Nazareth House. Founded by a group of concerned individuals in 1888 its initial mandate was to provide assistance with burial and to provide welfare to those in need.<sup>14</sup> They work in conjunction with ☆ Children's home in Cape Town to provide residential care, foster placement, and social work intervention with children of Jewish descent within the community.

Cape Town Child Welfare is a now secular organisation with faith based roots dating back almost as far as Nazareth House. Founded in 1908 as The Society for the Protection of Child Life, it was created in response to a very high infant mortality rate in the early 20th century. Having since become the primary social welfare body concerned with children in the Western Cape, its mandate includes monitoring all children at risk in the region. It currently maintains a large number of community based projects aimed at reducing the number of children at risk.

The prevalence of a wide variety of Christian social welfare projects is evident all around. One only needs to look at many of the projects that are still operational in the city to be aware of the Christian imperative to charity. Even African National Congress literature from the apartheid era cites a number of Christian organisations that were in support of its anti-apartheid activities, both financially and spiritually.<sup>15</sup>

The existence of Muslim faith based organisations is more difficult to trace in Cape Town. By all accounts much of the charity and social welfare that exists in the Muslim community is quiet and managed between individuals. As Zakah accounts for much of the charitable activity in Cape Town and with the mosques and Muslim Judicial Council taking further responsibility there is less ability to track charity in this community.

2.2 Approaches to orphans and vulnerable children

The problem of orphans and vulnerable children is one that is approached in different ways depending on the resources that are available to a community or state, and upon the particular cultural and historical context in which the situation arises. In the latter half of the 19th and first quarter of the 20th centuries in the United States there existed a system of orphan trains where children were taken from the streets, institutions and abusive homes in the eastern cities and shipped to farming communities in the developing west.<sup>16</sup> Following World War 2 Hermann Gmeiner founded SOS Kinderdorf in response to the large numbers of war orphans, founding in 1949 the first of what was to become a massive multi-national non-government organisation that operates on a basis of providing family style communities for orphans and vulnerable children.<sup>17</sup> While the SOS Child Village model has a number of drawbacks and is not ideal for the individual development of the child, it has acted as an efficient response to caring with larger numbers of orphans at a given time.

More recently there have been other approaches to the question of how to deal with orphans and vulnerable children. Brazil notoriously had a number of paramilitary groups that executed street children who had attracted too much attention to themselves with their activities.<sup>18</sup> Several Eastern European nations still favour large residential style orphanages, as does China. Canada, the US and the UK have until relatively recently used institutional residential care, but shifted to a foster care model in the 60's and 70's for reasons of cost and for the children's developmental interest. Today the care of orphans and vulnerable children is foster care with an eye to permanent placement or adoption. The literature on the subject demonstrates that this approach is the most beneficial to the long term development and prospects of the child, whether they are orphaned or removed from the familial home for reasons of neglect, destitution or abuse.<sup>19</sup>

Chapter 3 Methodology

Of all the human sciences and studies anthropology is most deeply rooted in the social and subjective experience of the inquirer.<sup>20</sup>

In the preceding chapters I have outlined some of the literature that exists pertaining to the history of children's social welfare, orphans and vulnerable children and faith based organisations. Much of this body is written by psychologists, sociologists, policy makers, politicians, historians, 'africanists', economists, theologians, geographers, and students of every other discipline but, save for a few examples, anthropologists. This discussion raises some interesting questions regarding the children's social welfare field as a whole, but also serves to underscore the need for anthropological research on the subject. This is due primarily to the fact that other disciplines do not make use of experientially based field work to the extent that anthropologists do, and that to really understand the motives that drive the people studied, getting right in amongst them and seeing and experiencing firsthand what it is like to be them is the only way. Anthropology further provides the theoretical frameworks and extensive experience of cross-cultural analysis that allows for a study of a group that consists of multi-cultural individuals and exists across religious lines.<sup>21</sup> In this chapter the focus is to describe and discuss the methodology that I have used to study my sample demonstrating the relevance and validity of this research and of the conclusions that I will be drawing later on in this document.

3.0 Approaches to Altruism, Faith and Motivation

The study of altruism, faith and motivation has challenged theorists and researchers across many disciplines, not the least of anthropology with its heady reflexivity and postmodern influence. Religion in particular has long been a major focus of anthropological work. Indeed it formed the basis of much of the early anthropological research into 'The Other,' many of the early texts being in fact description of the theology of various other peoples. These early attempts at documentation and explanation of 'the other's' religion; undertaken mostly by individuals whom had little idea of cultural relativism and who were writing from a perspective of western thought. They were further often engaged in a comparative analysis of the symbols and outer manifestations surrounding the ritual and institution of religion. They rarely if ever touch on the subject of the individual's faith or beliefs and the specific ways in which beliefs influence people's activities.

This research report is by no means an attempt to correct an oversight in the history of anthropological interest and pursuit, such a project being far beyond the scope of a Master Degree it probably could easily encompass the life works of an individual suitable motivated. Rather I mention this historical omission in order to explain the vacuum of precedent that this research has been conducted in. Other disciplines have a number of techniques to attempt to measure or gauge altruism, faith, or beliefs, and this first section is to be a discussion of how these models have been used and modified to meet the needs of this research.

There are two variables that prove particularly problematic. These are faith and motive. The question of altruism is also addressed, but it is more readily understood by the way it interacts with these two variables; it is not an independent variable in its own right. First the question of how do we define these two variables, then the question of how to measure such subjective and personal variables. A discussion of altruism theory will be first, as research on altruism has been very influential in modelling the tools and measures that are used to better discuss faith and motivation.

3.0.1 Altruism

The question of altruism is one that I have encountered regularly while conducting this subject. As I am working with organisations that are charities and rely almost entirely on donated time and resources to keep running, under the at times unreasonable levels of stress and demands on the personnel,<sup>22</sup> the concept of altruism was brought up in many conversations surrounding this subject. The question of altruism, what it is and how to measure it has been addressed rather extensively, especially by psychologists and sociologists. Psychology and sociology contribute two main theories of altruism to this research; those are the behavioural models and the motivational models. Of interest to us here are the motivational models of altruism. Motivational models include behaviourism, psychoanalytical, and development approaches.<sup>23</sup> Behaviourism follows a classical conditioning model, stating that altruistic behaviour is primarily reinforced through positive feedback from those around us. Rosenhan suggest that altruism then becomes self rewarding, that the actors in question feel good about their actions and this reinforces the behaviour.<sup>24</sup> Psychoanalysis originally viewed altruism as being pathological, being fundamentally opposed to the interests of the ID. With modifications to theory, mainly allowing for more self direction than original Freudian psychoanalysis,<sup>25</sup> this approach has come to view altruism as a potentially healthy manifestation of maturity.<sup>26</sup> The developmental models of altruism attribute much more to the motivations of the individual in question. Where other models discuss positive reinforcement or oedipal issues as root causes of altruistic behaviour, the development models suggest that altruistic tendencies originate in childhood and reflect people's upbringing.<sup>27</sup> Where children were raised to feel empathy towards others and to be helpful they suggest you will have adults who are more empathic to the needs of others and more likely to behave in an altruistic manner. Once again this approach ties into a positive feedback loop where children are rewarded for altruistic behaviour, and this becomes internalised behaviour in the adults. From the anthropological perspective the development model in psychology has the most to offer. Understanding altruism as being transmitted behaviour taught through the upbringing of the young fits far more closely with our understanding of culture than do the other approaches discussed thus far.

Sociology has discussed altruism in a different light than psychology. There was not much interest in altruism in sociology until the 1960's,<sup>28</sup> and since then there has been an increased attention to altruism within the discipline. The 1964 rape and murder of "Kitty Genovese" in New York City, where not one of the 39 witnesses either intervened or called the police, caused a significant interest in the study altruism and factors that lead to altruistic behaviour.<sup>29</sup> Understandably researchers wanted to know how it was possible for not one person to take action to help Kitty Genovese, and the late 1960's and 1970's saw a significant increase in altruism studies. The sociological positions on altruism, much like the psychological one, was that pure altruism did not exist, altruism could always be explained in some capacity as being in some way driven by selfish motives.<sup>30</sup> The methodological approach that sociology has taken to is similar to psychology's methodologies. Experiment design focuses on testing for external factors that are thought to influence altruistic behaviour in a quantitative manner<sup>31</sup> and to express these findings primarily on a scale ranging from 'pure' altruism through 'pure' egoism.<sup>32</sup> As with psychology, early sociological studies in altruism focused more behaviours and consequences of actions than they did on the motivations. As part of a general shift in thinking on altruism that occurred in the 1980's<sup>33</sup> altruism studies began to be more interested in the motivational and intuitive aspects of altruism. The empathy-altruism hypothesis is an example of this change in understanding of altruism.

The principal aspect of the empathy-altruism approach is that people engage in altruistic behaviour because they have the ability to relate and feel sympathetic towards the people that they are helping. People are thus engaging in altruism either to reduce the negative feelings they experience as a result of this empathy, or to cause an improvement in their mood as result of causing another to improve their situation.<sup>34</sup> This is primarily an egoist approach to understanding altruism, but it does take a strong motivational stance,<sup>35</sup> making it a more suitable approach to understanding altruism from a perspective that anthropology can use. Its methodological approach is focused on understanding the motives of the people involved, and it allows for a qualitative approach to understanding altruistic behaviour. Using empathy as a motivational factor allows for the incorporation of a number of different models. It can take either an empirical approach to studying altruism, or can approach the subject from a more intuitive perspective.<sup>36</sup> Developmental models in particular have a strong ally in empathy theory, where the development of children can be linked to their particular capacity for feeling empathy, and thus behaving in an altruistic manner. Whether empathy can be demonstrated across multiple cultures to be a strong driving force remains to be proven, but it certainly cannot be neglected as possible motivation when studying altruism in any culture. On empathy Morris and Jefferies discuss another aspect of empathy, and that is that familiarity with the people in need of assistance drastically increases the tendency for people to be able to feel empathy towards them.<sup>37</sup>

Methodologically both psychology and sociology have taken a highly quantitative approach to studying altruism. The search for altruistic personalities or for the ability to define particular situational variables that would predict altruism has been psychology's primary focus regarding altruism in individuals and society. Batson outlines an approach using a variety of scales to reflect the impact of altruism on the mood or guilt of the actor, indicating which variables are available for testing.<sup>38</sup> Sociology has taken a slightly different, though no less quantitative approach to examining altruism. Where psychology examines the stimuli and motives involving the altruistic actions, sociology prefers to find the broader contexts of who engages in altruistic behaviours and what possible characteristics these people have in common.<sup>39</sup> Both of these disciplines focus heavily on experimental approaches which are not suitable to anthropology's usual field conditions and methods, nor to a holistic view of human interaction. Both disciplines have contributed a number of models of altruism which can be applied to the informants that have participated in this research, particularly the empathy altruism model. They have also provided a measure of scales that are applicable not only to altruism, which is a complex variable to analyse, but have been used to model two other variables that are examined in this research, those of faith and motive.

3.0.2 Faith

I use the term faith in this document interchangeably with belief. By faith, or belief, I am referring to the individual's certainty surrounding their religion, which should they behave, and believe in a certain way they will be living within the guidelines set down by their god. Doing so may be rewarded in the afterlife, or be to live more comfortably in this one, depending on the individual and religion. Allport expressed the problem best when he wrote of faith that “[t]o make a spectrographic analysis is not easy, since the prisms of each personality are unique.”<sup>40</sup> It sums up the fundamental issue of how to address a variable which is both not only subjective but also highly personal. Especially with regards to faith it is indeed rather difficult to have a measure. As with other highly subjective variables that researchers might have an interest in pursuing such as altruism or emotions,<sup>41</sup> faith can be measured through religiosity on a scale by observing a number a variables associated with faith and then assigning faith a mean average of

those variables. For clarity in this study rather than attempting to assign absolute categories of faithful or non-faithful, a five point scale has been devised which reflects a level of intensity of faith experienced by the informants and the institutions that they are affiliated with. This scale is:

not at all – somewhat – moderately – very – extremely

A number of questions were posed to get an indication of the intensity of faith experienced by the informant, typically in semi-structured interviews,<sup>42</sup> as well as observations of their environments, their style of speech and use of religious terminology. The interviews approached the question from a number of angles, including the direct questions of “Are you a religious person?” or “How much of a role does the church play in your life?” to asking about childhood experiences in religious centres, to inquiring about current attendance at religious ceremonies. Where individuals indicate that they are religious or spiritual but not adherents to a particular church the same questions were asked with regards to their relationship with ‘god’ or whatever they identified as their spiritual following. Further, in order to determine the levels of intensity of faith experienced by the informants in this research I have used a number of informal measures or observations. Primarily the frequency of religious service attendance is measured and the prevalence of religious symbols about the house and finally the frequency of religious terminology or references that they use in during their interviews and casual conversations. These are admittedly suspect in their subjectivity and susceptibility to misinterpretation, but there is realistically no way to accurately get a perfect measure of degrees of something like faith.

This study has been focused on institutions that are affiliated with a formal recognised ‘world religion;’ specifically the children’s homes and individuals that have been involved fall into the judeo-christian-islamic grouping. There are also two secular organisations that have been studied which in some ways act as a control group, however many of the individuals working within these organisations identify themselves as religious and exhibit varying intensities of faith in their own right. The measuring of an institution's level of faith or religiosity is in some ways more challenging than measuring that of individuals, though it has been done in previous studies. The ways in which religion and faith influence an institution is through the actions of its members. Founders, executive boards, directors and other members of staff all influence the direction and action of the institution. In cases like Nazareth house which is a part of the Roman Catholic Church there is little doubt as to the religious affiliation and intensity of the relationship. In some other cases such as non-denominational Christian non-government organisations or with religious individuals operating within a secular organisation it requires a more considered approach to determine where on the scale they would lie.

There are two primary methods that have been used to position institutions on the scale: one is by examining the mission statements and policies of the organisation and reflecting on the ways in which these are in line with the beliefs and philosophies of the faith with which the organisation is affiliated. The other is an observance of the routines and activities of the institutions, the daily adherence to religious observances, the prevalence of religious symbols or related artefacts and the behaviour and religious observance of the children who are in the care of these institutions.

The use of these factors to determine levels of religiosity has precedent, particularly in psychology where the strategy of observing religious behaviour such as prayer, reading of religious texts, or religious service attendance have been used effectively as indicators of individual religiosity.<sup>43</sup>

3.0.3 Motivation

Motivation is an aspect of human behaviour that is difficult to measure from an anthropological perspective. Research based theorists in sociology and psychology have made efforts to devise means and methods of measuring, or at least predicting human motivation. For the purposes of this research the question is rather: what specifically are the reasons, the motive, that cause an individual to work with children, and what factors have contributed to this. The ways in which faith or religiosity influence motive will be examined, as well as other factors that have contributed to the person's choice to work in the child welfare industry. One of the primary problems is that one cannot simply ask someone why they do something. Sometimes they will know their reasons, sometimes not, sometimes they will respond with polite generalities of 'doing good' or 'giving back to the community' yet these generalisations fail to reflect the individual reasons and motives that lead that specific person to wish to do good or contribute to the community.

There are a number of models available for the understanding of motivation in people, ranging from biological to psychological to sociological. The biological perspectives would argue that motivation for behaviours can be best understood by the ways in which it enhances the survival of the group, essentially an evolutionist approach.<sup>44</sup> Much of the discussion and theory regarding altruism discussed in the previous pages is applicable to motivation, indeed altruism is examined as one of the primary motivating factors in this research, and as it is viewed by many to be a factor in motivating behaviour, the models predicting altruistic behaviour are also applicable to these conditions.

3.1 Methodology of the study

There has been a variety of data collection methods used in this research. As with most anthropological research the primary research tools have been observation and interviews. In addition to these there has been additional review of printed material and files made available to the researcher by a number of the institutions who participated in this research. First I will briefly outline the strategies and methods used in the observation and interviews, as well as the particular conditions that existed during this research that influenced and affected the data collection, and then I will discuss the general demographic of the study and the findings themselves.

3.1.1 Observation

The use of more passive forms observation, as opposed to full participant observation that would normally be the preference for anthropology<sup>45</sup> was the primary observation that was conducted during this research. This was due to a number of limiting factors that made full participation with the institutions and organisations being studied unfeasible. The main problem which prevented me from fully immersing myself into the environment and participating as a member of the community was that the organisations themselves were unable or unwilling to allow that level of involvement from a relatively unknown person. Because of the legal and ethical considerations when dealing with children, especially children who are already vulnerable and in crisis situations such as having been statutorily removed from their homes or living on the street, most of the organisations I was working with had to limit my interaction with the children. I was permitted to spend time at the facilities during the day, to speak with staff, volunteers, and children who were there, but I was not allowed to remain in the evenings nor to participate in the as might a volunteer. In fact most of the organisations did not have much by way of volunteer involvement with the children at all; in most cases volunteers rather donated time to administrative needs such as professional services that they might be capable of providing.

Many of the organisations routinely screen their potential staff and volunteers quite thoroughly; and volunteers are not left alone with children unless they are very well known to the organisation. In fact many of the organisations prefer not to accept casual volunteers at all, finding that they are too unreliable and are in reality a possible liability to the rehabilitation and development of the children.<sup>46</sup> However, while I could not participate in a manner that would replicate the activities of the individuals I was studying, I was welcomed quite openly to come and spend time at the facilities. I was invited to attend the social worker's meetings and other administrative activities, as well as the social functions that the shelters often held for the children and the sponsors, and was also kept informed about any special events that were occurring. I was free to ask questions of everyone there, as well as in a few cases given access to the non-confidential files relating the functioning of the organisations, and once the people involved became adequately comfortable with my presence, and ‘bribes of tobacco,’<sup>47</sup> I was able to perch unobtrusively in a corner of the place and watch everything going on about me.

3.1.2 Interviews

Interviews have provided the majority of my data for this research. When it became apparent that I was not going to be able to embed myself and participate fully, that is engage fully as a member of the community, I shifted my strategy to conducting in-depth interviews with a wide variety of the people involved with the organisations. Interviews were conducted with the directors, managers, social workers, volunteers, house-mothers, and childcare workers, as well as one domestic worker.<sup>48</sup>

In order to try and ascertain motivation in working in child welfare the use of in-depth life history interviews was used. They were general life histories going back to early childhood, and they endeavoured to cover as much as possible any early experiences that could have contributed to a desire to work with children. Family situations, religious upbringing, educational experiences, early role models, early environment, traumatic events, work history and any other variables that could indicate the process by which people came to be working with children were explored in the interviews.

Typically two interviews with each person were conducted, a preliminary semi-structured interview of about an hour to one and a half hours where we discussed their jobs, how they began working in the industry, their religious views and beliefs, and other information specifically relevant to the research questions. This was then followed up in as many cases as possible with longer life history interviews averaging two to three hours. These longer life history interviews were done more organically than the shorter interviews. They were begun in early childhood and encouraged to continue chronologically, with occasional deviations where a particularly relevant or interesting topic related forward to their current jobs. Special attention was given to childhood schooling, religious affiliations or activities, family structure and relationships, role models, play, high school and varsity years where appropriate, career track, the point where they began with social work as a job or volunteer hobby, and any significant life events that may have occurred. These interviews have been a source of significant amounts of information regarding especially the individuals faith and religious beliefs as they were talking more about themselves than about their jobs, as well as the fact that they had met me at least once, and usually quite a few times by then, thus I was no longer a stranger as I tended to be during the first interview. In total I conducted full interviews with 18 individuals across 9 institutions and organisations, for a total of 32 interviews. The majority of these were life history interviews which were conducted as follow ups to shorter conversations where I had introduced myself and explained my intentions.

Many other informal interviews were conducted, more conversations really and are referred to in my fieldnotes rather than as interviews. These yielded some surprising gems of data as they tended to be in situations where my informants were highly relaxed; sitting on the pavement watching the children play, on public transportation while on our way to one of the projects, lunch. These interviews tended to be with informants that I had developed more of a relationship with and become quite friendly with. The reduction in barriers between the informants and me allowed for a frank discussion of sensitive topics that would normally be off limits. Often what appeared to be admissions were made at times like these, admissions to not really following procedure, to losing faith at times, to sometimes just wanting to give up.

Discussions about the ways in which donors were handled and managed, as well as the realities of running a shelter that would not normally have been disclosed were also brought up at these times.

I have left the quoted transcribed dialogue as close to the original recordings as possible. I have added punctuation only for ease of reading and to indicate pauses in speech. Otherwise all dialogue remains unchanged, including duplicate words or other grammatical inconsistencies.

3.1.3 Other Material

Finally there is a great deal of written material that has come into my possession, both printed and digital, which has contributed to my understanding of the organisations and how they operate, as well as the individuals operating within them. This material consisted of sponsorship literature, fundraising pamphlets, annual reports, records of correspondence, organisations structure charts, external reviews and reports, and other miscellaneous pieces.

3.1.4 Timeline

The collection phase of this research was conducted over six months spanning from January to July 2008. There are a few conversations which occurred with informants in late 2007 which have been referenced, but the formal observations and research are in the 2008 period.

3.1.5 Ethics

As with all anthropological research, there are ethical concerns, especially where children are concerned. In order to preserve the anonymity of all informants, all names of individuals have been changed. Where appropriate I have also disguised the origins of quotes and my discussions of certain events to not associate them with any particular organisation.

4.0 Faith Based organisations in Cape Town and their actors

There is no lack of faith based organisation in Cape Town to study, at last count over 67 Christian children's homes or shelters, 3 Islamic homes, and 1 Jewish home which remains unnamed at their request. The largest of the homes and shelters include Nazareth House, Vision, Al-Maun, Holy Cross, Ons Plek, Homestead, Home from Home, as well as many others.

The proliferation of Christian institutions reflects in many ways the long standing tradition within Christianity of being involved with charitable works, especially with raising children. Levi claims that the Christian church has in fact had a "quasi monopoly" in dealing with poverty nearly since its beginnings 2 millennia ago.<sup>50</sup> Furthermore the colonisation of the world by, primarily, Europe was supported substantially by the Christian churches which promoted their faith in these new regions through the work of missionaries and various projects in these new territories, though the motives and means of doing so have come under criticism from a number of sources. The criticism of the church's role in colonialism per se is not the question here, it is simply important to recognise the role that colonialism and the church play together in establishing the church as a primary charitable force in South Africa for much of the nation's history since the creation of the Cape Colony in 1652. The Roman Catholic organisation Nazareth House for example is recognised worldwide for the quality of care that they provide.<sup>51</sup> The primary role of the church in delivering social welfare, or charity, has come under considerable scrutiny during the latter half of the 20th century, particularly in the United States where the constitutional separation of church and state has resulted in a long and heated debate as to the role that religious organisations may play in doing charitable work.<sup>52</sup> This is particularly relevant with the use of public funds, so much so that faith based organisations that make use of public money must now keep clear records to demonstrate that they do not use that money on projects that are religious in nature.

Islam has a strong theological onus to perform acts of charity, especially towards orphans or widows. A quick scanning of the Qur'an reveals 23 references to orphans across 12 books.<sup>53</sup> These references are particularly prohibitions against abusing or taking advantage of orphans or of taking their rightful inheritance or property for one's own gain. There is a hadith<sup>54</sup> that demonstrates the promise of eternal reward for those who care for orphans. The saying

Yahya related to me from Malik that Safwan ibn Sulaym heard that the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "I and the one who guards the orphan, whether for himself or for someone else, will be like these two in the Garden, when he has taqwa," indicating his middle and index fingers.<sup>55</sup>

The text is quite clear. As a number of informants have told me, the ultimate goal is to be as close to the prophet Mohamed as possible in the afterlife, so the promise that 'I and the one who guards the orphan' will be side by side like the two fingers on the hand acts as significant incentive. Along with the prohibitions against doing nothing when you know another Muslim is in need who you can help this would seem a strong encouragement to the Muslim faithful towards caring for orphans and vulnerable children. Further, in the Islamic faith there exists

Zakah, one of the five pillars of Islam, is a voluntary donation. It is typically calculated at 2.5% of an individual's net worth, but this is the minimum amount, there being not upper limit on donations.

Judaism differs from Christianity and Islam in that while it does have a tradition of charity and charitable works and donations; it remains an exclusive community which requires membership through the blood affiliation rather than through religious conversion like Islam and Christianity. This gives Jewish charity a different flavour than either Islamic or Christian charity, it being a more focused and more community oriented activity.<sup>56</sup> That said, while Cape Town's Jewish community goes to significant lengths to care for the members of their own community who are in need, they also donate time and resources to charities that act outside of the community. A brief look at the list of donors to any of the major charities in the city shows a hugely disproportionate number of Jewish names compared to the percentage of the population they represent in South Africa.

According to Illife before the arrival of Christianity and Islam to Africa there was not a strong association between historical religion and the temples or spiritual leaders and welfare delivery, it was rather the domain of the chiefs or other political leaders.<sup>57</sup> The association between charity and religion being therefore appears to be an imported concept, at least to southern Africa where he demonstrates that there is not a tradition of spiritual or religious institutions providing charity to the poor.

4.1 Secular Organisations in Cape Town and their actors

There are also a number of secular social welfare organisations in Cape Town that concern themselves with children in the city, though not nearly so many as faith based organisations. Some of these have Christian roots from the late 19th and early 20th centuries but have moved into the secular realm during the intervening time, others are organisations that were formed expressly outside of religious associations. Cape Town Child Welfare in particular is a large secular body that has the mandate to monitor all children in the Western Cape. It originally was founded with an affiliation to religion, but has changed to become a secular organisation in the intervening years.

The activities of secular organisations in social welfare are a relatively recent phenomenon, with beginnings in the great depression of the 1930's government involvement, somewhat earlier in France where a tradition of social welfare began following the French revolution. It is particularly well documented in the United States the progression that occurred, and especially the issue of a separation of church and state that has caused a great deal of controversy with regards to funding of religious charities or social programs.<sup>58</sup>

4.2 Who, How and Why: My sample

My sample of organisations was chosen based on a number of key characteristics. These were that 1) they ought to operate primarily in the City Centre area of Cape Town, or be within a reasonable distance from the City Centre, 2) they ought to be faith based institutions, with the exception of 2 secular organisations identified for control purposes, 3) they must be willing to allow observation and participation in interviews by members of staff, and 4) that they work with orphans and vulnerable children's with the intention of placing them back home, within their families or communities, or in appropriate foster care or adoption whenever possible.

The reasons behind these criteria are fairly direct; the desire to limit the research to the City Centre serves three purposes. 1) It assumes that the institutions will then be facing similar environmental variables and children; 2) it assumes that these institutions will have access to similar levels of resources, and 3) it allows for familiarity of the organisations with one another, encouraging discussions to involve more than one organisation. That they must be faith based organisations is a reflection of the research's focus on religiosity and beliefs as motivation, though there are secular organisations included to help provide a balance and to examine the individual's religiosity and beliefs outside of the faith based organisations. That they are willing to allow observation and be involved in the research is important to this researcher's ability to conduct ethnographic studies of the subjects. As fostering and child welfare work by faith based organisations is the focus of this research it was critical that the organisations be involved with the foster care and development of children, with a focus on foster placement or returning them to their families, based on the needs of the child.

The end result of the selection process left me with 7 organisations with which I worked closely. These are Nazareth House, Ons Plek, Home from Home, Vision, Al Maun, Homestead and ☆;<sup>59</sup> this consists of 1 Jewish organisation, 2 Christian organisations, 2 Muslim organisations, and 2 secular organisations. It was initially the intention to have 2 of each category, however the demographic makeup of Cape Town's children's social welfare organisations prevented this as there is only one Jewish organisation that was both willing to work with me and meets the profile for my sample. It is also for this reason that while the organisations I have worked with have been identified, I will deliberately confuse and obscure the origins of certain possibly damaging quotes or observations relating to the organisations in order to protect both the organisations and the individuals with whom I have had the privilege to work.

These 7 organisations have formed the basis for my research. They are where I have spent the majority of my time and conducted the majority of my interviews, however I have also conducted a number of other interviews with other individuals and organisations which where appropriate I will draw on in this document. These will not be identified explicitly unless it becomes necessary.

I will describe my samples in some detail. As these are all public organisations and in most cases they have chosen to be identified, I will give the background and operating policies of these organisations without fear of breaking confidentiality. It is with the individual's directly attributable quotes that I will as much as possible disguise the identities of the individuals with whom I have spoken, or the organisation with which they are affiliated in order to address issues of confidentiality or conflict that may arise.

My secular samples are Homestead and Ons Plek. These two organisations are in a sense brother and sister organisations as Homestead focuses on male street children in the Cape Town City Centre area, and Ons Plek is involved only with girls who are on the street or at risk, with the occasional very young boy such as in the case of a brother or baby of one of the girls. They are not formally associated as organisations, but they work together closely as they are the two organisations which focus most on street children and they complement each other's areas of activity.

Ons Plek was founded in 1988 in response to the “invisible street children,” that is girls living on the street, to act as a shelter for young girls in need of shelter. It caters specifically to young girls as they have specific needs and are more vulnerable in many ways on the street than are young boys. They operate 2 facilities, their main shelter in City Centre which takes the majority of the girls and deals with the more difficult cases, especially where drugs and violence are concerned. There is then Siviwe in Salt River which acts as a secondary care facility, being for girls who have been with Ons Plek longer and are better adjusted, as well as girls who are lower risk.

Homestead was founded in 1981 and it was in fact the first shelter for street children in the city. It was founded in response to what was seen as a great need in the Cape Town City Centre. At the time there was what was described as a ‘horde’<sup>60</sup> of children on the streets in the City Centre and surrounding area. They currently operate a daytime drop in centre for boys living on the street, a shelter in the City Centre for boys willing to sleep in the shelter and begin the process of either returning home or moving to the residential care facility, and a residential care facility in Khayelitsha where many boys from the City shelter are relocated after a period of adjustment and preparation by the social workers at Homestead. They have also recently opened another daytime drop in centre in Muzeinberg in response to a group of about 12 children that are now being found in the southern communities of Muzeinberg, Kalk Bay and Fishhoek. This location acts as a more local centre where they can attempt to reach the children, and also reflects the drop in numbers of children in the City Centre area, due both to the efforts of the police and private security as well as a general drop in the number of children living on the street in Cape Town which has been attributed to the recently increased age for which a child rearing stipend is available from the government.

The Christian organisations that I chose to work with are Nazareth House and Home from Home. These are organisations that have a history of cooperation, the founder of Home from Home having been a social worker at Nazareth House in the past. This has enabled me get a more intimate feel for the natures of the people involved as they were able and willing to speak about each other as well as of their activities. It is worth noting that given the plenitude of Christian faith based organisations working with children, my count indicating 67 at the beginning of 2008, I have also conducted some observations and interviews with individuals at other organisations which will give further data to be compared to these two. These two simply represent the ones which became the focus of my study because they most closely meet the criteria I was looking for and they were agreeable to working with me.

The Catholic institution Nazareth House is one of the earliest faith based organisations in South Africa, founded in 1881 by a small group of Sisters of Nazareth with an initial mandate for the care of at risk children and elderly. It has a long history of residential care for children in need, particularly of orphans. They act as a residential facility for a number of orphans, many with special needs such as mental or physical handicaps which are a result of pre-natal drug and alcohol abuse. They have also especially taken on a large number of babies especially affected by HIV/Aids, either being orphaned by it and/or being HIV positive themselves, being the first place to do so in the country. The convent, which acts as their primary facility in Vredehoek, and they have 2 subsidiary homes that they run in Wynberg for the children who have fewer demands in terms of care. Their primary affiliation is with the Roman Catholic Church and they actively promote what they describe as a moral Christian lifestyle, though are they are liberal in terms of accepting the religious denominations of the children in their care, when known.

Home from Home was founded in 2005. It was initially founded to take over responsibility from Nazareth House in running a number of foster homes in Khayelitsha that they were no longer capable of managing.<sup>61</sup> It has since expanded the number of homes considerably and is now working in cooperation with churches and community groups to run homes and programs in addition to the ones that they are wholly responsible for. They are non-denominational in nature, though adhere to Christian values and encourage participation of the children in religious life, as well as giving preference to Christian staff.<sup>62</sup>

My two Muslim samples are Al-Maun and Vision; two children's shelters that are located in Athlone/Lansdowne area of the Cape Flats. This is not directly in the City Centre proper, but as the majority of the Muslim population lives primarily in the Cape Flats and most of Muslim faith based organisations are to be found there, the distance from the centre of my research is not only reasonable but also unavoidable.

Al-Maun was founded in 1992. They are a residential care facility for Muslim boys that have been statutorily removed from their homes. At the time I viewed the facility there were no 'proper' orphans there, all the boys had at least one known parent still alive, but they had been placed in the care of Al-Maun either because their parents were incapable or unwilling to provide proper care, were abusive, or the children had run away from home for any number of reasons.

They boys ranged in age from 5 to 11 and experience a wide range of emotional and behavioural problems. It is a Muslim environment foster care facility that provides care and endeavours to rehabilitate children who often have behavioural problems. Unfortunately access to resources to try and treat these children's deeper problems is unavailable. They attend a Muslim environment school in the area and receive further religious education at one of the local madrasahs.

Vision Children's Home was founded in 1991, though the founder had previously been hosting children from various institutions in his home for quite some time. He had also been involved with the creation and running of other Islamic charitable organisations before deciding to dedicate himself fully to the project of Vision. They are an Islamic organisation that accepts boys and girls of Muslim descent. This translates as children who are from the Islamic community or have Islamic names. Vision also adheres to a Muslim environment both in terms of religious observations such as remaining halal and observing the prayers, as well as maintaining a code of dress and behaviour consistent with their beliefs. It was founded by Seraj primarily in a response to the need for Muslim environment residential care for children, the primary issue being that for a Muslim to know of another living in sin that he could do something to alleviate the problem and to do nothing is also guilty of sin.<sup>63</sup>

Chapter 5 Doing God's Work: Personal belief as motivation

I really I all my life I felt something, I think this is why god created me, he wanted me to do this.
Theresa<sup>65</sup>

On the level of individuals the main question in the research has come down to that of motivation, personal motives that lead to and sustain working with children in situations that are extremely difficult and challenging. The ability to assess motivation, particularly motivations that relate to religion or faith is a special challenge, but one that ethnographic methods of field work can overcome with patience and persistence. As discussed in chapters 2 and 3 the science and philosophy of measuring altruism and motivation is an intense and detailed field in its own right, but many of the insights it has to offer into human motivation will be applied here in understanding the ways in which people come to care for children who are not their own, and how they remain in a field which is continuously challenging on both a personal and professional level.

5.0 Personal Motives in Working with children: Beginnings

The steps that bring individuals to work with children are varied. No two people have the same story or the same reasons for why they work in children's social welfare, nor can one point to any particular common aspect of personality, demographic or history that correlates as the cause or reason for people to work in children's social welfare. Rather there is a rich blend of factors; history, opportunity, situation and beliefs that have culminated in these people working in the positions that they are in now. In the majority of cases they have made a conscious choice to work with children in these organisations. Here we will explore some of the reasons and events that have led them down this path.

When I asked the people I met why it is that they worked in this industry there were a variety of answers. Common answers were ‘I saw a great need’ or ‘I had always had an interest in working with children’ or ‘It was a sign from god, it was what he wanted me to do.’ These answers reflect some of the more common themes, but there are other reasons. Some people simply were looking for any sort of work and a job as a care worker was convenient or available. One woman moved through the ranks from being a cleaner at an institution to eventually being a the house mother of a foster home in Khayelitsha. Another person had been volunteering to take children on excursions over the weekends when the organisation asked him to consider working full time for them and he accepted. Here we will examine the chronological events that led many of my informants to working with these children and begin to examine the similarities and patterns that emerge in this kind of work. There are two primary topics that I wish to pursue here: 1) god/belief as motivation, 2) ‘helping people’ or ‘doing good’ as motive.

I did not begin this research with the intention of studying religion or faith. It was forced on me by the repeated assertion of my informants that they were motivated in many ways by their beliefs and further by the high prevalence of faith based organisations and individuals who expressed high degrees of religiosity even within the secular organisations. Thus it became clear that research in this field would discover that for many individuals, faith, religion and motivation are inextricably enmeshed. Another theme that occurs regularly is that of wanting to help others. This is a complex concept, as questions of who needs help and what help involves vary from person to person; however a general idea of help recurs consistently among my sample and warrants further investigation. This concept of helping others is entwined often with general ideas of 'doing good,' which is further often interlinked with beliefs and religiosity depending on the individual's belief system surrounding ideas of what exactly is good.

5.0.1 The Question of God:

That it was god's will, or that it was required by my beliefs is an explanation which came up in a number of interviews and conversations at various organisations. These were not always faith based organisations, religion or god was perceived to have influenced a number of people working in secular organisations as well. A large number of respondents attributed to god the desire or purpose to which they had begun to or continued to work in children's social welfare.

Theresa and Christy are only two of several Christian examples, those who spontaneously attribute their work to god. Theresa for example directly attributes her previous dissatisfaction with her life and disinterest with the business she ran to the fact that god's will for her was to go to bible school and then to start an orphanage for orphan babies.<sup>66</sup> I began this chapter with a quote from her that reads "I really I all my life I felt something, I think this is why god created me, he wanted me to do this."<sup>67</sup> A fairly direct explanation as to how her beliefs have led her to this work, but also it goes back to a yearning she couldn't quite identify. In the same interview Theresa also talks about the lack of satisfaction that she experienced with her other jobs and the business she ran. She describes the horror that she felt when she saw the conditions at the government orphanages that she toured, and that is when she knew what she needed to do.

Christy also attributes working in children's social welfare to the will of god, but in a different way. She had been looking for work in Cape Town and attributes the fact that she was offered a job with Homestead as a sign from god that she was to that she should work with children at a non-government organisation. It was a sign from god because the position entailed the financial drawbacks of leaving a government post to do so, and also the loss of benefits, but he had prayed for a way to return to Cape Town and this is what she was offered for her prayers.

Among the Muslim respondents there was no question that they were motivated by god, that this was a religious mandate for them to complete. Seraj and Sylvia both describe the ways in which Muslims must help other Muslims that they know to be in need; to do otherwise is a sin. Sylvia discusses this somewhat in describing Seraj's personal religiosity:

Sylvia: so yeah you listen to all these motivation people and listen to how they speak and they have to captivate you somehow or another I mean even a lot of our great priest that speak on the radio and publicly if you listen them they say exactly the same thing that we are saying take care of the aged and of the young people but people are scared to do it and their only one reason they afraid that if they give of their selves and their finances they're not going to have enough but what people forget is that faith carries you through which is what he's proven time and time again, Seraj, he's proven that because he has so much faith he actually able to take an idea into fruition because of his faith and his belief<sup>68</sup>

The strongest emphasis that Sylvia gives this is that faith or belief is the key factor in determining charitable behaviour. She says 'what people forget is that faith carries you through' and that 'Seraj, he's proven that because he has so much faith he actually able to take an idea into fruition because of his faith and his belief.' If people were to maintain and be strong in their faith they would be more able to help those in need. Further, she identifies Seraj's faith and by association her own faith as primary means that allow them not only to continue their work, but shows that with faith Allah will intervene and help. So we see not only the religious imperative coming from religious leaders to care for those in need, but also the understanding that with enough belief it will always be possible to care for others.

It was not found among my Jewish respondents that there was a strong association between the will of god and choosing to work in children's social welfare. Rather concepts of charitable behaviour and community responsibility are the primary sources for this behaviour. In pursuing this topic, one informant divulged an extremely interesting explanation for why this is, and while it remains the opinion of a single individual it speaks volumes about why the Jewish community contributes so much to charitable causes.

You know Andrew, it's interesting, it's not religious at all really. It's more... it's the pathology... part of the whole thinking of people. You know the Hebrew expression for charity, there is no word for charity in Hebrew, and instead to mean charity we use the word tzedakah. It means justice. It's not about giving handouts, it's about levelling the playing field, about making things right...<sup>69</sup>

Justice is a very powerful ideal. That charity in Jewish culture is linked so strongly to concepts of justice that they are equated with one another on a linguistic level illustrates a very strong cultural imperative to give and help others.

5.0.2 Helping others:

The notion of wanting to help, of feeling that there was a need was one which existed frequently, especially among secular women interviewed. This was especially common in those that had trained in social work or a related field, the idea of wanting to help others often being what lead them to choose to study in that field. Directors of 4 organisations, both religious and

<sup>69</sup> Interview Nov 17/08: Ronald, White Jewish male in his Mid-50's. Director of a Prominent Jewish Historical Organization in Cape Town and a Board member of several Jewish charities in the city. His office with Historical Organisation secular, describe the notions of wanting to help others from a young age as one of the factors that lead directly to their involvement with social work. Sara, who is director of a secular organisation, recalls how she became interested in studying social work

Sara: I um.. we had a tea... somebody came to talk to us at the school, I guess they probably had various people come to talk about different careers and things like that and I remember this particular person I thought wow that sounds exactly like that I want to do, she must have just explained herself very well, you know the way she described I just know that was the kind of thing I wanted to do. I always wanted to help people, you know that kind of vague I want to help people I don't like the situation that other people are in that's not as good as mine you know kind of... social work seem to be the way one could do that

Me: had you given any thought to something like social work before that?

Sara: not that I know of, I used to think that I would want to help animals prior to that talk, I mean I didn't really think about it that much, that was probably two years before matric, so it wasn't a last minute thing<sup>70</sup>

It is interesting that she thought she wanted to help animals before hearing the woman speak because it demonstrates that Sara's desire to help extends beyond people, and is an inherent impulse. Further, Sara says she 'always wanted to help people' and describes it as a vague sense 'I don't like the situation that other people are in that's not as good as mine...' which is a directly empathic dislike for others suffering. It is an almost textbook example of altruism through empathy described in chapter 3.

Similar sentiments were expressed by the director of one inner city shelter and daytime drop in centre

Christy: well when I was very young with everybody being in the navy I thought I will go to the navy, and then I sort of started thinking about um either teaching because I enjoyed school so much, or I wanted to do something where I would be a benefit to people, so I either thought of nursing or social work

Me: can you remember what made you settle on social work?

Christy: I actually don't know, I just one day knew, that's what I wanted to do.<sup>71</sup>

<sup>70</sup>Interview June 4/08: Life History with Sara of Homestead. How she came to study social work

<sup>71</sup> Interview May 7/08: Life History with Christy of Yinzani. How she came to study social work Again there is the desire to be of 'benefit to other people.' It is not as clear an empathic motivation as Sara above, but it carries the same sense of wanting to help. The fact that nursing or social work were the only two choices that seem to occur to her as a teen is also telling. They are two disciplines that traditionally were open to women and are both disciplines that directly relate to helping other people.

5.1 Patience and Compassion: Personal challenges

No one who has spent time working in or visiting an orphanage or children's home would believe that it is an easy job. Aside from chronic understaffing, underfunding and overcrowding which make it a very challenging professional environment to work in, there is also the aspect of the personal challenges of working with problem children. With few exceptions these children are from backgrounds of neglect and abuse. They are often in need both of extensive counselling and of discipline to try and return them to even a modicum of normalcy within society. The personal aspect of this profession is one which I find most telling of what drives many of these people to continue despite the upsets that occur regularly. There are three areas that I wish to address which demonstrate the strategies used by individuals to deal with the frustrations and difficulties that arise in their work. These are 1) the personal challenges that occur in the daily work environment, 2) the challenge of empathy, counselling children and dealing with their problems, and 3) dealing with failure, when children don't 'make it.'

5.1.1 The challenges of everyday work:

Working with children is a job rife with ingratitude and confrontation. There are parents and other family members who feel that you have stolen their children and/or are not caring for them properly, there are government officials and social workers who are by turns militant that you should be observing their rules and negligent in following up on their own responsibilities. Then there are the children themselves, many of whom resent being in the shelters or homes even though they are often the ones who have made the choice to be there. These factors all combine to create an at times extremely hostile work environment.

One of the most memorable events that occurred in the time that I was in the field was the abduction of two children. Strictly speaking I have difficulty calling it a kidnapping as they were taken by their parents, but it was done illegally. I did not witness the event personally, but I was at the shelter the following day and experienced the response and was given a detailed description of the happenings. The children were playing outside of the shelter when the parents apparently arrived in a car and simply took the children. It was witnessed by a childcare worker who was supervising the children. The shelter immediately called the police and the children were returned within a few days, but the event shook the whole community deeply.<sup>72</sup>

During the time I spent at another shelter the staff were on alert for any cars that might be sitting outside because there had been a recent problem with the father of one of the children. He had been watching the shelter and was saying that they had stolen his child. The man was a drug dealer in the community, and was not trusted by the shelter. He had previously been denied the right to see or be involved with the child. His girlfriend, however, had a relationship with the girl which the staff felt was being manipulated to get information.<sup>73</sup>

Finally there is with the attempts at family reunification and family visits the threat of the child not returning. Often the children experience a great deal of freedom when they visit with their families and it can be very difficult for them to readjust to the more structured environment of a shelter or foster home. One house mother described it as such: “Madison: Because sometimes when they come from their homes they are very very naughty because they hear the stories you are not the mummy because they used to say mummy to us and then they hear when you are not the mummy and then ahh...”<sup>74</sup> The difficulty in dealing with children that are not your own, and with having to deal with families is professionally difficult, but further, Madison refers to how hard it is to have a child who you have raised reject you based on it. ‘[T]hey used to say mummy to us’ is more than just how the children in your care treat you and think of you, it is the reality that these women are surrogate mothers with the feelings that motherhood entails.

It is a similar problem to the one faced by the shelters which deal extensively with street children, that the street for all of its problems is actually quite attractive. The opportunity for drugs, easy money from tourists and a lack of rules appeals to many of the children more than rules and school, even if they are associated with somewhere safe to live.<sup>75</sup> Again Madison outlines some of the problems of sending the children back into their communities for short periods

Me: the children, have you had some that were really very naughty? Get too bad?

Madison: on the moment, there's not, first you know kids come is naughty. He used to be and then but we lucky I have almost experience with these things, so fine, is just a child. You know they also they have teachers you know they were there at school or they were not there, sometimes they have friends sometimes they hang with the wrong friends... some, their parents are drinking the whole weekend, there's no one to say no, and now you come to here and do that behaviour here because you see there is no one, not to me, a child must be a child... very difficult, very very difficult, sometimes they go home you know they their home always... and when they come back you go fetch them there they don't want to come back again cause I ... oh they can maltreat me, now from baby I have you on my back and now you say I maltreat you, for these people you see for two minutes, [upset]... but ah, in the long run they let me see now, because sometimes I want to go there, I bring all those things I think she likes and ... I know I know I tell them from the start ohh this child is going to get...<sup>76</sup>

Madison talks about the same problems with the families, how they undo the positive work which has been achieved with the children, but further she reacts quite strongly to the rejection of the children when they 'maltreat' her, saddened and upset by it. She also refers to 'now from baby I have you on my back' referring to the technique of carrying children wrapped against the back with a cloth. It implies closeness and a bond between child and carer which Madison draws on as part of her relationship between the children and herself. She has done these things for them like their own mother would have.

Aside from the possibility of losing children there are the challenges that arise when dealing with what family the child may still have. Madison describes the situation well when she says

Madison: yeah they get along... you see the thing is this, it's just like the customer in the shop, the customer is always right, the parent it always right even though he doesn't do work, you are the one who is blamed you see ohhh... but he leave a child this small, you look after the child all the years, suddenly when he comes he sees something wrong and oh... these people they don't know how their wearing, they don't even know nothing, have not even a handkerchief for a child, not even sweet for the child, now we pack things when they go home, you see just to visit

<sup>76</sup> Interview May 1/08: Life History Madison. About when the children return home for a period of time when she come back they want to come too, the stuff is not there, you can t say oh this is that and you find. That is you know the things we met you know

Me: so who is it that, if the parents complain who do they complain to?

Madison: they come to us, you see me I gave them Julia's number because really these people I just give them they can go complain there by Julia. You see this one give me a hard time, I gave her Julia's number she complain by Julia.

Me: and how does Julia deal with it? Is she good at it?

Madison: oh. Sometimes we fight and she's too soft for these uncles. You know and then ohh you know sometimes um...

Me: can you give me an example? How is she too soft sometimes?

Madison: you would think you would thing... if Julia is a bread winner for these children and also a superior [boss] for everything but they got the phone and they speak to Julia and say I want the child at such and such a time and Julia says no he can't stay longer like that he just must ??? the phone, got the phone you know.... you see when you got these children must know you got this

Me: she must be a very patient woman

Madison: yeah yeah yeah,, and still is how can I say and still Julia is the one who is providing for these child and you come in and shout on the phone and childcare used to phone and all that they next morning must here again and you prepare that Julia must laugh at you... even when you ask where is the pants it doesn't come, even when you ask he's got four pants when he's going home or six and where is the other two, where is the other four? Whoa it is a big problem

Me: so sometimes they will keep the clothing

Madison: you see they are supposed to have their own clothes because is their children, they must have something there for the child that is waiting for the child at their home and then our clothes stay here and are for the child when they come back. But we not do like that because we know the child is going to be naked<sup>77</sup>

Madison refers to the idea that 'the customer is always right, the parent it always right' to outline to problem of dealing with families. While she may in fact have the best interest of the child at heart we have a cultural belief that the biological family has some inherent right or interest in the child that is sacrosanct.<sup>78</sup> Further she describes Julia as the 'breadwinner' and 'superior [boss]' and yet she still has to deal with difficult parents who do not demonstrate appropriate respect. Finally the problem of families taking clothing or other items from the children when they return home illustrates in many ways their inability to care for children. Other homes report similar experiences with the parents of children. One informant related that there had been incidents of parents taking the clothes that had been given to the children and selling them to get money for drugs and alcohol.<sup>79</sup> Thus the relationship between organisation and family is often a rocky one defined by conflict and strife rather than cooperation.

Another example of disagreements between organisations and family arose in a situation where the home was arranging for psychiatric care of a resident and the girl's mother refused to acknowledge that it was necessary.

Beatrice: well in this particular case was over the removal of the child, but it specifically, when it blew up it was um because the child was on antidepressant medication and the mother didn't want her on the medication and that's when things got very ugly and blew up, but I mean that same mother has terrorized and has tried to sue virtually every single professional everything in town do you know what I mean, so it's just for those few months ... and it was hard because you know you tell your committee and they say ahwhwhwhw.. but they don't realise... you know when you've got someone screaming down the phone at you that you're a fucking schizophrenic cow and and making threats about your own children you know they don't realise how stressful it is when you deal with that on a daily basis, I must say it took my committee a long time before they actually ... we eventually just banned her from the premises and told her that if she ever put her foot in here again we would get an interdict against her and that shut her up. But it was like 6 months of...<sup>80</sup>

Beatrice describes how difficult and stressful it was, the very insults which she had to deal with and the lack of assistance from her own board. At first it would also appear that the disagreement is over legitimate differences of opinion about how to treat her child, simply blown out of proportion. However when we consider that the same woman has 'terrorized and has tried to sue virtually every single professional' that has had an involvement with her child we see a pattern on dysfunctional behaviour.

These kinds of problems often do not have an obvious or simple solution; they are the problems that arise in the regular running of these organisations. It is rather means by which individuals cope with the personal emotional aspect of the challenges that becomes interesting. Madison for instance says "You cannot work with children if you if you do not go to church because you must have heart. Cause these children sometimes they get very naughty, they get very very very naughty, so if you've got no heart you think that, oh..."<sup>81</sup> For Madison there is a direct correlation between being religiously observant and having the strength to continue in her work when there are problems. But Madison further goes on to lament the inability to discipline beyond the restriction of privileges like pocket money or sweets.

Madison: my mother was just like every mother, my mother and my father they were very strict... there was rules, they were not... there was no things like abuse of something because its only now when they say when your child who want your child the best possible for your child and then they say your child must break the rules, your child can come 9 o'clock at night can come 5 o'clock for the food at lunchtime can comeback at 8clock at night and you must just give food for him and go through and wake up and wash and go .... when you just... you see we have a corporal punishment and we used it but we were taught once and we recognised that if we don't want that in the future do the right thing, so we were very sweet? We were good listeners in our time, not this time with this children, even a small child can tell you something I say you can't do this to me, you see, I don't want you do that, you see, but ...<sup>82</sup>

Madison is relating some of the difficulties and conflicts that arise when there are cultural norms that govern childrearing. Where Madison would prefer one style of child rearing with a more stern form of discipline whereas the government and social workers would label that abuse.

Here we have different approaches to dealing with the challenges which are demarcated across the line of faith. Individuals who are working with faith based organisations are often more prepared to accept the inevitability of unpleasantness, but also more likely to cope in terms of belief, of doing the right thing and as Christy expressed it “There is a scripture that says the lord won’t test you beyond what you can achieve.”<sup>83</sup> Atheist informants however tended to respond to the situation by confronting it and trying to change it. Beatrice for example banned the disruptive mother from the home in order to remove the problem, but it was 6 months of high stress to get to that point. Samantha manages the stress by professionalising the role and segregating it from her personal life.

5.1.2 The Pain of Empathy

One aspect of social work that the shelters undertake when working with these children is to take a history of the child. This serves a number of purposes; it allows the social workers to attempt reunification with family, it alerts them to possible abuse, it informs them of the current conditions on the street or in the community which may be relevant to their operations, and it familiarises them with their charges so that they are able to assist the children in whatever manner best suits their interests. I had the privilege to be allowed to observe at a number of shelters’ case review meetings where the children’s cases were discussed in detail which familiarised me with the individual cases and gave me a general idea of the conditions that are being confronted. I could not help but become aware of the levels of empathy that these social workers and child care workers feel towards the children when their cases are discussed, especially those cases that involve various forms of severe physical and/or sexual abuse.

One of these was regarding the practice of often opening meetings with a prayer. The director Patricia is a Muslim, with the majority of the staff being Christian. She often starts the meetings on Tuesdays and Fridays where the staff discuss in depth the girls and recent event. One particular meeting stands out in Caroline's memory as being particularly moving, she describes it as thus

Caroline: we had been having are really hard week, problems with some of the girls, it wasn't long after the fire...<sup>84</sup> we had all been having a hard time. Patricia came in and before anyone said anything she said let's begin this meeting with a prayer... it was really touching, I almost cried. I think everyone was moved.<sup>85</sup>

This we can see as evidence of the intensity of emotion and stress that is often experienced by the staff at these organisations, particularly the sentiment of almost crying. This for a professional environment is a strong level of emotion to be showing, but more to the point it is the prayer which is such a touching aspect of the meeting.

5.1.3 Failure

All things being fair and just in the world these children would go on to be happy and lead fulfilling lives. All things are not fair and just, despite the hard work and effort that goes into these children, many do not 'make it.' What exactly it means to not make it varies: some of them die, some of them choose to go back onto the streets, and some are reunited with families that later fall apart again and this time they do not get rescued. All of these things in some way reflect a failure, be it on the part of the child, the system, the informant or of society in general but it does not do much to mitigate the hurt that is felt when a child's potential is lost, nor the challenge to the faith of my informants, both religiously and their faith in the child social welfare system.

<sup>84</sup> The organization's main building had been gutted by a fire some months earlier. They were at the time of this interview operating out of one of their smaller buildings. This time was characterized by a great deal of stress and a higher work load, as well as overcrowding at the smaller building while they waited for the reconstruction of the main shelter to finish, which was past schedule and over budget.

Sylvia tells a wonderful story around failure. Well not wonderful, it is in fact an awful story. It is about a boy who was known as Kentucky, who died. When explaining to the children why it is important to listen to Seraj:

Sylvia: I said to him tell that story about the guy, they called him Kentucky, so he was at Buitten Nuir [another home Seraj was affiliated with] that time and he ran away because he didn't like the conformity of the rules and the regulations and he then went to live in a shack with a friend of his and the lamp fell over and he burnt to a crisp his hands look like this [mimicking claws] and eventually he got a government grant and Seraj used to take him and then to said you know where it is and you can etch your own money etc etc. He got his money and then he decided to go and blast a bit of it he ran to catch the train because he couldn't grip the rail properly he lost his grip and he fell and the train smooched him completely so I was telling the children and the moral of the story is if he tells you don't do a thing you listen because he's got insight that we can't understand you know how people some people just have this feeling but it's inexplicable I can't tell you what it is but I know something is going to happen.<sup>86</sup>

Here there is little sense of loss. It is tragic that a boy lost his life but it is explained in terms of disobedience and as consequences for not listening. I asked one of the boys at Vision what he thought of Kentucky and he responded "He did something he was not supposed to do, when you go against what you are supposed to do sometimes bad things happen to you"<sup>87</sup> Again while there is sadness and loss, he is held responsible for his own actions, both in being burnt the first time he left the home and the second time when he was killed by the train. Seraj himself didn't want to discuss Kentucky, just saying that “It is very sad, you know what I mean, but people make their decisions.”<sup>88</sup> Again it is defined as outside of the control of the institution, essentially the fault of the individual.

Emma talks about her own coping strategies “Emma: When I go home I turn off. I have my work, I counsel the girls here, but I can’t go home with it. I have my husband and two children I need to be with them, not worrying about some girl.”<sup>89</sup> And she further notes that her life outside of work is outside. She talks about her church involvement as another big aspect of what she does

Emma: My husband is a full time pastor, that is his calling and I work with others in the community, and the childcare work is mine. We operate a congregation in Claremont, it used to be only Congolese because my husband is fluent in French, but we decided to open it up and now we have some Nigerians and even some South Africans.<sup>90</sup>

This perspective that childcare work for her is the equivalent of his being a pastor. There is definitely an aspect of religious imperative in her reference to it being her calling. This ability to shut off is a skill that some of her colleagues find enviable, Caroline remarks that

Caroline: I wish I could be like that, I wish I could just turn off, but I find that 8 o’clock at night I’m still thinking about the girls or the case I worked on today. Sometimes it is really hard and it’s the first thing I think about when I wake up in the morning or I get a call at night and right away I think oh what’s wrong, what’s happened.<sup>91</sup>

Her inability to disassociate work from private life proves problematic, to be so wound up that the first instinct at a ringing phone in the night is to think of the girls is a telling about how strongly she is affected by her work.

Christy talks of failure in different terms. As a religious individual in a secular organisation she has a different perspective. The policy that the organisation operates under is 'Never give up on a child.'<sup>92</sup> Unlike many of the other organisations which will not accept a child back after it has left,<sup>93</sup> Homestead will always work with a child that wants to try and is willing to follow the basic rules.

Me: Do you have a lot of kids who get sort of... who either don't come back or refuse help, how do you deal with?

Christy: um... yeah... I mean you still when we see the child encourage him to come back, we don't say well you made your choice, and but it is difficult, you feel sometimes that you failed, and yeah, and you sort of need to tell yourself that it's not necessarily you that's failed, it's the child that's made the choice, and you must just keep trying to change his frame of mind, to make a different choice. I mean we would say a child can't come in because he slept out, we will accept him back, and work with him again and see if this time it doesn't...<sup>94</sup>

There is a clear sense that the feeling of failure can exist quite strongly among the respondent. Again it is in terms of choice. The children have made their choice and Christy accepts that without the cooperation of the child progress is not possible. It is also the mitigating belief in persistence that keeps her pursuing the goal, that if you try again maybe this time it will take, this time things will work.

A final example of how children sometimes don't work out is from JP speaks about a girl who they worked with who was just too much trouble. The example of one of the girls that simply could not remain in their care is telling, more from the foster mothers feelings on the issue.

Julia: we took on stupidly a 16yo girl and we should never have done it, we did it because they begged us to...she stole, she caused absolute havoc and she ran away, and that didn't do the foster mother any good and it didn't do the young girl any good, so you know we sort of have to be sensible with who we take, but within the sort of 2 – 12 age group there isn't much they really can't.. can't cope with... The child was truanting hugely from school or when the child and he or she was really rebellious and... you knew that wasn't going to do any good for the family unit the children... even though Madison she's lovely she said there's another one she's going to take he was running away and causing havoc and Madison said he'll be alright when he comes to me, he didn't because we didn't feel she should take... have that stress she would have taken that child... so a child needs placement we will almost always if we've got room well take it.<sup>95</sup>

Madison the foster mother who was responsible for this girl was somewhat less absolute in her condemnation, simply saying “Madison: I tried, but she was too much... too much... it is better she is gone, she was... It was no good to the other children, how can you have children and take care of them when you have someone like that? Always trouble...”<sup>96</sup> So the best interest of the other children prevailed, the girl left and there was a sense of general relief. There is also an emphasis that it was a foolish action in the first place; they were influenced by their desire to help.

There is certainly a precedent for religion acting as a tool for coping, as Byamugisha notes a tendency among faith based organisations for good retention of volunteers, directly attributing this to religious motivation in their reasons for volunteering:

Remarkably, the dropout rate amongst volunteers is generally very low, less than 10% after an average of 2 years in most groups. This is probably because the great majority of volunteers feel that their work is worthwhile and are also motivated by their religious faith<sup>97</sup>

This finding by Byamugisha echoes what this section has been attempting to demonstrate, that through faith and religiosity people are drawn to and remain in jobs or positions which are extremely difficult.

5.2 Nurturing 'Good' children: What is a 'good child' and how do we raise them

The question of how does one raise good children is one which can stir quite a lot of controversy. From my own perspective I believe that the best thing I could do for my children would be to raise them as confident, liberal, rational, inquisitive creatures that question everything and are not afraid, but rather relish challenging and overturning social norms surrounding religion, sex, politics and anything else that most others take for granted. They ought to be ambitious, but towards their own interests and skills rather than necessarily towards a societal defined norm of success or wealth, though that may well be what they are good at and enjoy. I would most certainly raise them away from my own culture's somewhat twisted sexual and gender standards that still promote an imbalance between men and women, and that in some way views sex or sexuality as dirty or shameful. In doing so I believe that I would add to the world people who would in general lend themselves to the enlightenment of humanity, promoting my beliefs of secularism, personal liberty, independence, and the many other ideas that that I believe in. The reality is that I would probably be setting my children up for years of counselling and therapy.

My own beliefs surrounding children and society in general differ somewhat from those of my parents, drastically from my grandparents, and are likely different from most of my generation in Canada. Where my father was essentially forced to attend medical school, I was simply informed that I would finish university one way or the other, and my own children may pursue any path they chose, either academic or other. However the question of how one goes about raising good children causes a great deal of disagreement in societies that are relatively homogenous, to say nothing of societies such as in South Africa where people with vastly different histories and cultures coexist. In the course of my field work an issue that came up frequently was the difference between white, coloured and black styles of child rearing. Typically these were educated western people making value judgements of black or coloured parents who they perceived to be raising their children inadequately, but also the reverse is true as we saw with Madison's thoughts on discipline. This is just one of the many ways in which cultural differences arise and complicate relationships in South Africa.

This section however is not to be an analysis of implied racism and cultural conflict with regards to rearing children, but rather I intend it to demonstrate the ways in which individuals working in child welfare seek to raise good children in accordance with their own beliefs and norms. This research being concerned primarily with faith based organisations, I will demonstrate that a major aspect of the work that individuals associated with these organisations do is to teach and pass on the moral and religious imperatives of their respective faiths. To do this we will look at 1) sex and drugs, 2) prayer and religious observances, and 3) plans for the future; ambition for the children.

5.2.1 Sex & Drugs

5.2.1.1 Sex, Abortion and Contraceptives

Few subjects can get normally calm and rational people frothing at the mouth like sex, contraceptives and abortion. One just has to look at the rhetoric employed by any of the major world religions or United States election campaign concerning abortion, premarital sex, sexual education and contraceptives to get an idea of the cauldron of emotion and the history that surrounds the topic. In the United States doctors that perform abortions are routinely targeted for harassment and even assassination and clinics specialising in planned parenting and abortion have been subjected to a number of attacks. There is ongoing debate in many nations surrounding whether abortion should be legal at all. In this context the attitudes held and promoted by the workers in child welfare organisations are an important indicator of potentially common ground or religious motive in performing their work.

One particular conversation I had with a social worker at a secular children's home Ons Plek provides an excellent perspective on the ways in which personal religious values can influence the operation of secular organisations. We had been discussing the children in the home, of which there were 17 at the time, and the case of one 16yo girl struck my interest. This particular home was one of the few in the city that would accept pregnant girls, or new mothers, and so Caroline and I got onto the topic of how one counsels a pregnant teen.

Me: So how do you deal with a young girl who is pregnant or has a baby?

Caroline: Well, here we try to give them a safe space. They attend school as much as possible but they are completely responsible for their babies. They must change the diapers, feed them, take care of them at night. It is their responsibility.

Me: What about the girls who are pregnant? How do you work with them?

Caroline: well we try to give them space, when they are on the street or fighting with family they can't make good decisions about what to do, so we give them space and we tell them about the options they have.

Me: and what do you encourage them to do?

Caroline: Here at Ons Plek we want what is best for the girl.

Me: so what are the options?

Caroline: well we look at what the girl needs, if she is finished school or if she can get a job. If she has family that can help her with the baby. She can keep it, she can give it up for adoption, if there is reason she can get an abortion

Me: you say if there is reason

Caroline: well here we prefer that the girls do not have abortions, they can arrange for adoption if they are not able to care for the baby, so abortion is for if there is a good reason, medical or something like that.

Me: that is Ons Plek policy? What about the counsellors here?

Caroline: what do you mean?

Me: Umm... the policy of Ons Plek for abortions is that you discourage them, do the counsellors here feel the same way?

Caroline: I do... and I know none of the people here want the girls to get abortions. There are other ways<sup>98</sup>

The emphasis here is twofold. There is the idea that the girls must take responsibility for themselves and their actions in getting pregnant or having children. But then there is also the aspect that the staff at Ons Plek discourages and disapproves of abortion unless it is for a ‘good reason’ on grounds of medical need or something similar. Further Caroline’s position that none of the staff approve of abortion speaks of a large organisational ethos on the subject. In light of the high levels of religiosity expressed by Caroline and other members of staff at Ons Plek this demonstrates the influence of religious belief in the organisations and operation of these non-government organisations. Out of context this conversation could simply be with someone who is not in favour of abortion, but other conversations with staff at Ons Plek as well as some of the girls reveals that they allow their own beliefs to influence the way in which they advise the girls. One of the girls states her thoughts on the subject quite clearly: “Nonhlanhla: Abortion is not an option. It is about learning to take responsibility for your action.”<sup>99</sup> For a 14 year old girl this is likely a taught attitude from the staff at the organisation. Where for many of these girls abortion could arguably be the most expedient solution to a problem, they are being urged to carry to term. When I pursued the topic, or rather asked her to question her conclusion she became extremely agitated and evasive and maintained that it wasn’t right to kill a baby. I wasn’t able to determine conclusively that she had explicitly religious reasons, but it remains in the realm of moral belief.

The question of sexuality and sexual activity is one that all of the organisations struggled with in one capacity or another. The Sister in charge of the children's projects relates that:

Me: And why are the two house in town separated like that? Most of the other homes have mixed boys and girls...

Sister: We had to set up two houses. We raise them together and teach them that they are brother and sister, but they know that they are not really related. We had a few problems with sex, so we decided that the best thing would be to keep them apart. They see each other at school and when they play, but boys are not allowed in the girls' house and girls are not allowed in the boys' house.<sup>100</sup>

While it is a reasonably effective solution to ensure that if they are having sex at least it is not happening in the home itself. The question of why it is that sex is so discouraged comes to the fore in my mind. Sister refers to the fact that they are raised as family which brings up questions of incest taboo. But the words 'problems with sex' force me to propose that, assuming the sex was consensual, then the problem is one of moral belief on behalf of those running the organisation. This problem is also faced by other homes. Beatrice describes a similar incident in their home:

Me: And has there ever been a problem with sexual activity between residents?

Beatrice: Yes. Hehehehe. It's not allowed, ok, it's not allowed, but yes we have yes, and that's very problematic because we say to them they live together like family and therefore they can't get involved but they're actually not family and it's a very difficult one, but we had uh there was once we had to actually send one of our kids home for a week, a boy, because we couldn't keep him and this girl like apart, and I mean normally we wouldn't do that but we actually sent this kid home, it wasn't him it was actually the girls hahaha we sent him home for a week until we could make arrangements for him to be elsewhere.<sup>101</sup>

<sup>101</sup> Interview May 27/08: Life History Beatrice. Discussions of some of the challenges encountered in work

And again in Al-Maun

Mary: I have to pay attention. We used to have a problem, some of the older boys being sexually active with the younger ones. They would sneak around at night if you didn't watch. A lot of the boys here have been abused. By older brothers or other people, they know about sex and they go after the younger boys or do things with each other. That is why it is open dorm beds like this, everything can be seen.<sup>102</sup>

Not only in faith based organisations is sex a problem. Secular organisations also experience problems with residents becoming sexually active with one another. During a weekly childcare worker meeting that I attended the issue of one fourteen year old girl initiating sexual behaviour with one of the younger girls in the home was a major part of the meeting. It was addressed from two perspectives: one was to determine if this was indicative of a previously unknown history of sexual abuse in the girl who had initiated the behaviour and the second was the issue of how to counsel both of the girls to best 1) prevent repetition of the behaviour and 2) prevent or mitigate possible trauma.<sup>103</sup> I unfortunately failed to take the opportunity to find what was most alarming, the young ages of this children involved or the homosexual aspect of the behaviour.

So as we see sexual behaviour is strongly discouraged between residents in the homes. There is however a difference in the approaches taken by faith based organisations and secular organisations in their attitudes towards sex. Most of the faith based organisations actively teach abstinence from all sexual behaviour. There was one exception where the organisation had chosen to take a more progressive approach:

Beatrice: ok we are um... um.... basically we make contraceptives available to the kids if they need. We... we speak to them about it. We're very open. Obviously we don't allow them to have boyfriends or girlfriend and have sex in the house but if we know that they're sexually active we will see that they are protected.<sup>104</sup>

This differs from the typical approach which is to promote abstinence, though in all homes the children are made aware of the use of condoms. This is largely because of the awareness of HIV/Aids in the population and the need to protect oneself. It is not done as a way of promoting sexual behaviour, but rather an awareness that some of the children will have sex regardless of how much you promote abstinence.

5.2.1.2 Smoking, Alcohol and Drugs:

Smoking, drugs and alcohol represent another area that organisations are forced to concern themselves with. All organisations have zero tolerance for drugs and alcohol. That is not to say that drinking or using drugs will get a child thrown out, but rather their use will not be tolerated and will result in significant disciplinary action and intervention.

Smoking is typically viewed with more tolerance than drugs and alcohol, viewed often as very much the lesser evil. As Beatrice describes the issue:

Beatrice: yeah, cigarettes, ah is one of the things that we don't get into big fights about, there used to be a rule at ☆ that when you were 16 you could smoke, and a lot of people are against this because they feel 16 is too young over the years, but we've kind of just left that rule... at 16 you can smoke, not in the house, outside, and we know that the younger kids smoke as well and... we went through a period of fining them and this and that and eventually my kind of philosophy is your dealing with so many bigger problems like alcohol and drugs and sex and... that really smoking cigarettes I'm not going to fight with them if their sitting discretely in the bottom of the garden having a cigarette so we kind of tend to turn a blind eye to that one.<sup>105</sup>

The same rule applies at other shelters, one staff member describes the situation; it is a case of openness. “We don't want the girls to run around hiding it from us. We don't encourage that they smoke, but if they do we would rather they tell us and be open. If they hide that they will start to hide other things."<sup>106</sup> Here the concern we see is that there needs to be an openness, a chance for dialogue with the children. Trying too hard to enforce less important rules will drive the children to secrecy where more important or dangerous behaviours may be involved. Core needed concepts of honesty, and openness; open to discussing behaviour but not oppressive in regulating the activities of the children.

Other organisations however are much less tolerant of smoking. Madison for example does not allow smoking in the homes at Khayelitsha, and she holds quite strongly that smoking is an unacceptable behaviour, and she has never smoked. She holds smoking as an example of what could occur if the children are allowed to skip church on a Sunday.<sup>107</sup> Vision Children's Home has eating a box of cigarettes as punishment for being caught smoking.

5.2.2 Prayer and other religious observances

The prevalence of a number of religious observances among the faith based organisations further demonstrates a means by which organisations seek to raise good children. By indoctrinating them into the moral and social framework of a particular religion they provide a basic set of rules and guidelines for life and behaviour. Vision Children's home is a particularly good example of religious and moral education in a faith based organisation. Beyond the maintenance of a halal kitchen and orthodox lifestyle for both the children and the staff/operators, they provide additional religious education in the home with madrasah tutors who are paid to come and instruct the children, observance of the 5 times daily prayer required in

Islam and having a modest dress code especially where girls are concerned (that is to say no short skirts and the older girls cover their heads, but veils are not common.) Mosque attendance is required, the whole household typically attending together.

A very interesting case of religiosity and of religious instruction of the children in care by a faith based organisation in Cape Town is that of Nazareth House and of Home from Home, which adopted the practice from Nazareth. All children are expected to have a religion. The organisation respects and gives preference to the religion of the child's family in any case that it is known, however when it is unknown the child is baptised and raised Roman Catholic. This reflects Nazareth House's imperative that children have a moral education. Sister Margaret outlines as "Well, we have moral instruction, it is not specific to any religion exactly but it is certainly based on Roman Catholic Christian principals of modesty, chastity, sobriety."<sup>108</sup> While Nazareth House exemplifies religious acceptance in their operations, there is still a very strong sense of moral responsibility to the children, and these are based on Roman Catholic beliefs. Sister Margaret further elaborates on the moral education that they have at Nazareth house. She describes one of the motivational speakers that they had come as talk to the children:

Ah we have a wonderful speaker who came and spoke to the children. She is a wonderful woman and a real role model. She is HIV positive, but she comes and talks about how she is able to live a normal life. She is married and has children and is really a good Christian and provides a Christian education.<sup>109</sup>

Thus regardless of organisation there is a focus on trying to teach moral values. The key values of importance that Sister Margaret emphasises here are marriage and children. However with regards to things like sex and drugs the secular organisations tend to perceive that the children are going to do these things and their role is to try and minimize damage with education about safe sex and drugs, whereas the faith based organisations tend to teach abstinence, that children must not engage in these activities and will go to efforts to first curb and then prevent these behaviours. Religious individuals within the secular organisations operate in a limbo, often promoting abstinence to children while acknowledging that it is not a requirement of the organisation and educating about safe sex and drug use.

5.2.3 Plans for the future, ambition for the children

TLC wasn't created to just be another institution and just to be another foster home. It was created to make and to produce people of value to society where we can turn around in 20 years time and say look at what Joshua can do today he is a great leader or great teacher or even a great father, we're not going to proscribe what they need to be, but they have to contribute.<sup>110</sup>

The focus of children's social welfare is in many ways the future. There would be little point in fostering children if there was not some idea that there was a possibility of taking a child that would otherwise not have opportunities and giving him a chance at making a normal life for himself. The vision of the future that people have for these children can be highly indicative of what their motivations and beliefs are, as well as demonstrating the ideals that they hold for the children. This helps to reiterate the ways in which motive and intention interlace with each rotation of the cycle.

Each organisation, in fact each individual, has different ideas about the potential of these children. Secular organisations tended to have a darker perspective on the possibilities for the children than did faith based ones. This difference seemed to be defined by a matter of perspective; faith based organisations were looking to visions of what could be, secular organisations reflecting perhaps a more realistic view of what is likely to be in their experience. It at times provides an interesting dichotomy between hope and despair. The quote from TLC's promotional material is from one of the children of Theresa, TLC's founder. It illustrates the importance of looking to the future of the children quite solidly at the beginning of this section. 'People of value to society,' 'great leader,' 'great teacher' and 'great father' are all descriptions she uses to describe what she wants for the children with whom she works and lives. These of course all have implied values of what a great anything is, but there is the desire for so much more for the children.

The founder of the same faith based home for orphans as above described her views on the subject quite succinctly when she said

I've always believed that a newborn baby just is a package of potential; all it needs is somebody to help it to produce that potential at the end. But you're not going to get that out of them if you're not going to give them quality in the first place. So if you're just going to give them mille pap and stick them in a dark room and think that that's going to do the job, it's not going to do the job, you need to give them an environment that they can flourish and their potential can come to the fore<sup>111</sup>.

Here we find the hope and aspirations that could be held for the children. It remains unformed, but the sentiment of hope and possibility for the child is clear and the desire that much should be done in order to help this child reach his potential. By contrast the director from a secular organisation illustrates some of the harsh realities that exist. She points out simply and clinically the following:

Sara: It's a huge bottomless pit of problems, and the drugs that we were talking about add to the problem. But I mean there are no jobs for these kids, I mean even if you're a great kids and you've never had a problem in you live and you've got matric you can't get a job, so when you're a kid like this who's also got various brain damages from all the drugs they've used and are hardly literate,

<sup>111</sup> Interview April 19/08: Teresa of TLC. Conversations about her experiences with government orphanages that led to starting TLC

they can't get into any kinds of course because the entry requirements are so high, because there's so many people that want to get in so they always do that they push it up and up and up so now you need matric to do anything to be a carpenter to be you know so our... it is the big challenge to prevent these guy ending up back on the street again as youth, what are we going to do... it's all very well were going to look after them until their 18 but if you're now going to say goodbye, a lot of them are going to end up back on the street.<sup>112</sup>

The problem of futures and of what possibilities are available to these children is a major concern for the people working with them. The harsh reality that faces many of the children in the care of these shelters is that economic or social opportunities for them are rare when they are older and many of them will return to the streets or crime as a means of survival.

The differences between religious and secular organisations are further expounded when we consider that many of the religious organisations take an extended interest in many of the children. The Muslim and Jewish shelters had a history of arranging aftercare programs for their children after the age of 18 where they attempt to facilitate their integration and independence in society. Secular organisations do have programs, but theirs is a less individual approach to the children, whereas it is not uncommon in religious based organisations for them to arrange jobs and maintain an extended interest many years after the children have left the homes.<sup>113</sup>

With secular organisations there is an attempt to further the care and provide integration for the children in their care, but there is a less involved approach. This is due partly to the fact that the secular organisations do not share in the rich community that many of the faith based organisations enjoy by being affiliated with religions or specific churches. Where a faith based organisation may be able to find one of their promising children a position or opportunity with the members of their affiliated communities; whereas secular organisation do not have that base

Chapter 6 Religion in the Home

The institutional Package

The question that comes to mind with this research into motivation, beyond the personal reasons, is how the faith and beliefs of the individuals and institutions studied influence their operations and the care of the children.

This chapter is to be a discussion as to the ways in which the beliefs or religions of the organisations studied interacted with their operations, children, staff and the relationship they had with the outside world. It is divided into two sections. The first is an examination of the means by which religion, belief or attitudes are transferred to the children in care of these organisations and the implications of this. The second concerns the conflicts that arise between religion and the secular world, the ways in which faith based organisations and religious individuals within secular organisations find themselves at odds with those around them and how these conflicts are resolved.

6.0 Transmission of Belief: Converting the Children

Historically much of the activity of faith based organisations has been mandated by a desire to spread the influence of the religion in question. There has been an implied understanding that by accepting the assistance of these organisations the individual is also accepting the proselytising that accompanies that aid. de Wall discusses a number of faith based organisation in southern Africa, one in particular where they have a strategy of stealth to proselytise to the people they assist.

Faith plays an important role in the lives of many of the program staff. Personal belief systems drive and sustain individuals and teams, without dominating the treatment care program: 'they say feed him, clothe him, heal him. And when he asks why? Then you say Jesus. That's the difference'<sup>115</sup>

The staff and organisation express awareness that people do not particularly want to be preached to, but that there are more subtle ways to get their message and hopefully gain converts.

The two primary means of transference that we are interested in I have determined are direct and indirect. Direct refers to the intentional and structured transference of belief through formal styles of education. Direct methods of transference include formal religious instruction such as madrasah, Sunday school or yeshiva/bais yaakov, the observance of formal prayer, attendance of religious activities/ceremonies (church, mosque, shul), and the adherence to religions environment in the home. There were varying degrees of direct transference at different organisations which I was involved with. The Islamic faith based organisations had the highest prevalence of observance, maintaining a strict halal environment and a high level of observance to religions practice and sending children to madrasah. Multiple daily prayers, the maintenance of a halal diet and modest code of dress and conduct, enforced by consequences for failure to adhere were all means by which the beliefs and attitudes of the religion were taught to the children. Christian faith based organisations also forced a high level of instruction on children, though there was more variation between different organisations than was observed in Islamic organisations. Sunday school, church, grace before meals and prayer before bed were common in the majority of the homes where I spent time conducting observations. The organisations themselves were more flexible, tending to leave this up to the individual house mothers, but a preference for Christian women to run the houses<sup>116</sup> encouraged religious education of the children. The Jewish home had the most difficulty with religious education and observance among its children. On an institutional level it does require adherence to orthodox rules but enforcing this was far more difficult than in other homes. This was because the children were typically statutorily removed from more affluent backgrounds and had a higher degree of education and a large sense of entitlement. It was also because the criteria for admission to the home was that they were Jewish, but this is as much a cultural category as religious and all of the children in the home at the time of my research had come from non-observant homes. So while there were attempts to educate the children about their religion and to encourage religious attendance, it was a secondary consideration to larger problem that they were dealing with such as drugs, alcohol, sex and behavioural problems.

Indirect transference refers to the environmental references and cues that instil religious behaviour or habits in children, the presence of symbols or literature, the use of religious terminology and casual references to religion. We will examine both of these; however the focus will be on the indirect methods as they are more telling in the interactions of the staff with the children. Indirect means of religious instruction are also prevalent both in faith based organisations and secular organizations. There is a high prevalence of ‘casual’ prayer, religious references and religious education by the staff at most secular organisations studied, though on an institutional level it is not a part of the operating procedure. The secular organisations have at times more difficulty with religion as they often have staff and children from a plurality of religious backgrounds. Emma notes that they stopped saying grace in Ons Plek when they started receiving a larger number of Muslim children

Emma: Most of the childcare workers are Christian though we cannot advertise for specific people, we must advertise broadly or we are discriminating. Some of the childcare workers feel like they cannot encourage the girls to pray now because with the Muslim children it would not be right<sup>117</sup>

The reason that they do not specifically seek Christian staff is not because of a religious openness, but rather because they are not legally permitted to discriminate based on religion when employing staff. Further the staff has felt restricted in their ability to provide religious instruction by the presence of children from other religious backgrounds. The concern with religious instruction serves a number of purposes. As noted in chapter 5 there is the aspect of raising 'good' children. Madison's assertion that if you don't send the children to school pretty soon you will find them smoking or misbehaving in other ways<sup>118</sup> demonstrates that there is an understanding that religious instruction and attendance of religious services plays an important role in raising children who behave in a culturally appropriate manner. Beatrice notes that while it is impossible to force more than formal religious observance on the children she does believe that they would benefit from it if they would take an interest:

Beatrice: you know, I think... (sigh)... oh, I don't know... you know these kids have got so much to deal with that pushing religion on them as well you know for me is really bottom of the barrel... but... ahhh... I think it's hard for our kids, YEAH I think if they showed more it would be great... but you see we're not going to push, I'm not going to push them into it... um.... you know we've got so many rules here, Friday nights not negotiable you have to go to shul... um, I feel sorry for our kids how can they go to shul when they're the only children there? You know what I mean so ach... yeah I mean I think if people have faith, faith it certainly does help you um I think maybe some of them could benefit from it.<sup>119</sup>

Again religious adherence is not an option. Not an option as Beatrice says, however she recognises that it is difficult for the kids and possibly is not what they need in their recovery. These are just some of the more visible and expected ways in which faith based organisations and religious individuals seek to educate and enculture the children in their care into their faith. Examples where religious members of secular groups teach children to pray were not uncommon. One director of a small secular community program I had the pleasure of spending time with in Philippi, after leading them in grace before an afterschool snack, said to the children “You guy’s must learn to pray, ok? You guys all go to church, what must you do. You pray pray pray.”<sup>120</sup> This reflects the imperative that many individuals feel, a need to instruct children to observe religious practices, and also the understanding that rote instruction and habit is a powerful tool in any form of instruction. This reflects an experience I had when attending a service at a mosque. When I first began to inquire about Islamic faith based organisations in the city one of my Muslim friends invited me to join him at his regular mosque for prayer at midday, and to speak to some of the people afterwards. While I would say that my welcome by most members of the mosque was not exactly open, many men refused to speak with me at all despite my attempts to observe the formalities such as (style of dress, etiquette and participate as well as I could in the prayer). One man did take some time to talk to me and he asked about my prayer habits. I responded that I did not really believe, to which he told me “No, you pray and pray and belief will come.”<sup>121</sup> This recognition of rote and ritual as a cornerstone of religion is seen and the instruction by Emma that “You pray pray pray” is the same as that which I received from my stranger at the mosque that Thursday afternoon in January.

The religious education and upbringing of the children is an important task to many of those involved with children’s social welfare. Both secular organisations and faith based organisations engage in religious education and indoctrination to varying degrees primarily in an effort to help the children and to encourage them into lifestyles that are more in line with their hopes and expectations. And as Julia points out it is not necessarily for the children, but for those around that these actions are taken.

Julia: well if they knew what the child’s... if it was a mother that they knew they wouldn’t baptise it, but if the children, if they had no idea, or if there was a chance that the child was going to go back to another family then they wouldn’t baptise the children because they... but most of the children at that time were really sick and dying and it was just automatically they would be... I mean it was the babies it was more for the adults around that they were baptised it wasn’t for um... well obviously for the children’s soul, but but you know it wasn’t something the children had any part in.<sup>122</sup>

That the baptisms were for the benefit of the adults present, and the children’s souls as a second though is rather telling about how people are concerned with the children. The giving of comfort to the staff by baptising the children also shows that there is a real concern for the kid’s religious upbringing.

<sup>122</sup>Interview June 30/08: Life History Julia. Her experiences while working at Nazareth House as a social worker

6.1 Religion and the Functioning Home

Religion, in theory, goes beyond church and prayer and what you eat or wear. It is supposed to act as a set of guidelines for life. This section is an examination of the ways in which religion influences the organisations studied and their relationship with those around them. It is divided into two sections. The first is a look at the role that religion and religious affiliation plays in the organisational structure and operations of the institutions. The second and more interesting section is a discussion of what things go wrong; the conflicts that arise between religious ideologies and others.

6.1.1 Religion and Standard Operating Procedure

Donations, especially monetary funding, are the lifeblood of any non-government organisations, without which no organisation in Cape Town, or anywhere else, would be able to remain open. The faith based organisations studied here are adept at securing donations and they use their religious affiliations to the best of their ability when doing so. However in order to solicit money from religious donors faith based organisations must be careful in the way they market themselves. All non-government organisations are aware that their public image is a major factor in determining donations, but faith based organisations have to be doubly aware, not only must they have excellent public images with regards to the work that they are conducting; they must also ensure that their operations are in line with the ideology and ethos of their target donor population. Topics of religious sensitivity such as sex, drugs, abortion, homosexuality and prayer must be carefully managed. Too stringent in operations and many liberal and moderate donors are alienated but there is a great deal of money available from the religious right i.e.

evangelical Christians and fundamentalist Muslims. Too liberal an ideology and practice will attract other donors and make more government funding more accessible, but the faith based organisation loses another potentially lucrative source of funding in the religious right. The personal beliefs of the founders and directors will play a large role in where the faith based organisations will try to position itself on the scale of religiosity in the public eye, but also the availability of funding for certain types of projects varies with the donors. For example the United States' President Bush administration made international headlines when it modified its foreign aid policy to exclude anyone who provided family planning options other than abstinence, which is in line with the modal beliefs of his republican support base.

Henry discusses the aspect of operating procedures in the organisation when he discusses the regulations at the Jewish home

Henry: you know what they used to do, on a Saturday morning the kids were dressed in their smart clothing and they would walk one behind the each other in a line, you know like in the old days, Jesus pathetic, they would walk one behind the other down to the synagogue and they would sit there and god help you if you spoke, if you made a noise in the service, not that anyone knew what was going on.<sup>123</sup>

First the ironic 'Jesus pathetic' mid quote shows irreverence for the religious observances required by the organisation. However they no longer are quite that strict, but the regulations still require that they attend. They do not always do so depending on who is on duty, and adherence to the Sabbath is given some flexibility depending on the care worker. As Henry points out, it is about the development of the child more than anything.

Henry: what we got now, you see out weekends, each child worker used to work Friday night through till Monday morning, now that is hectically long, so we got in a relief worker to work Sunday evening, so that means we work Friday evening to Sunday evening. So if I am on duty I will take them to synagogue Friday evening. She then decided she can't Sunday evening so she would prefer to work Friday evening, which means I am never there on the Sabbath. Um... as far as their Jewishness is concerned we try and keep kosher in the house, we try and instil some Jewishness. The Jewish festivals they have to adhere to. On a Saturday we don't take them shopping and take them downtown and take them to the movies whatever, but so much of it is hypocrisy because all their Jewish friends go to the movies on a Saturday, how can we not allow ours to go just because they happen to be in ✡, just because the Jewish community happens to finance them.

But it also clearly illustrates the direct correlation between the image that is maintained in the community and the support that they receive from it. There is a real concern that the children in this home are not seen to be breaking the regulations. And this has paid off, as both Beatrice and Henry note, this home is well funded and resourced compared to others in the city.

Henry: We are really very privileged. It's far removed from children's homes. We are first world and they are third world. The Jews look after the kids quite well, too well, they are actually quite spoilt. And you see it's a problem because some of them come from very poor families they go back to nothing<sup>124</sup>

And further that maintaining a 'mild orthodox' approach to the home keeps the best balance between maintaining good ties with both the orthodox and reformed Jewish communities.<sup>125</sup>

The Islamic homes all used similar strategies of maintaining a visibly religious operating procedure, both for their own religious reasons, but also because the majority of their donations come from the Muslim community in general and it is necessary to curry their favour. This was done by observing the correct halal diet and modest codes of dress, but there were also other strategies implemented. Vision for example holds a monthly awards ceremony to this effect. This is an event where prizes are given to the residents for best student/athlete/room etc. What makes this an interesting event is that they invite roughly a hundred people from the list that they keep of all their previous donors, as well as people from the community. The ceremonies include a guest Imam who talks about the charitable work being done and recites from the Qur'an, as does one or two of the children. There are the awards themselves where the children uniformly thank Allah for their achievement, and there is tea and snacks afterwards.<sup>126</sup> This monthly serves to maintain the image and presence of Vision in the minds of the community and to reassure them that they are faithful and adherent.

Both Jewish and Islamic organisations made an effort to nurture and cultivate local communities' relationships with these kinds of behaviours, though the Islamic organisations maintained that it was more for religious reasons, the Jewish organisations acknowledged that there was an aspect of managing impressions. The Christian faith based organisations were less conscious of nurturing strong ties with the local community by promoting through their children. Much of their funding comes from abroad, mainly Europe and the North America, as well as a large number of volunteers who come to work with them. Much of their religious positioning is done through the internet and promotion through word of mouth. There are exceptions to this however, as there is still money to be solicited from local donors and foreign donors are notorious for showing up and expecting tours of the facilities that they are paying for. Emeritta for example runs a home that cares for, at the time, 148 children and has a finely polished religious image. During my first time at the facility I experienced what I cynically think of as 'the pitch' where Esther told me about the religious awakening and experience that led her to open this place, and also shown the chapel area and was treated to a song and dance and prayer by the children that could be marshalled while I was there. The whole affair had a distinct flavour of tourism to it, but in later conversations we discussed the way that donors perceived these activities and that many of the groups that donate to the organization expect to see something of that nature.<sup>127</sup>

6.1.2 When things go wrong

Ideology and religious belief is a contentious subject at the best of times, even more so when orphans and vulnerable children are thrown into the fray. Typically faith based organisations are seen to be doing good work and improving the situations of the children they work with; however, there are times when the beliefs of the faith based organisation do not coincide with those of others, be it social services or society at large. There are a number of examples that we will look at here to illustrate the problems that can arise and the ways in which these issues are addressed.

There are three main areas that we are interested in here. These are 1) the strategies used to accommodate the multi-religious nature of the children that many organisations are being asked to care for, 2) problems that arise with the raising of the children themselves, adequate preparation for the real world, and 3) conflict between the ideals of the institution and others’.

The plurality of faiths that are encountered in the average foster home can be impressive. To say nothing of different denominations of the same religion, many of the homes have children of several different religions in them. This is particularly common in the Christian faith based organisations as they are the most prolific and tend not to impose restrictions on the children that they accept, where as our Islamic and Jewish homes were able and chose to restrict their children to those that already at least nominally were members of their faith. The practice of encouraging the children to pray at Ons Plek came to an end when a number of the children who came into the home where Muslim. The concern being that it would not be appropriate to tell Muslim children to pray in a Christian manner. Nazareth House encountered a problem when someone challenged them on not having halal food available for the Muslim children in their care. This problem was addressed in a rather creative manner, the kitchen in their residential facility continued to prepare food for the majority of children that were Christian while a local halal restaurant was asked to supply enough food for the three Muslim children that were in residence.

The problem of raising children in a highly religious environment brings up certain issues of adaptability. To use Nazareth House again, they began their program of smaller residential homes in the city instead of keeping children at the main mother house after they realised the children were becoming ‘little nuns’<sup>128</sup> rather than developing in a way that would allow them to best reintegrate into the cultures and societies that they were ethnically a part of. This type of problem is addressed well by Madison at Home from Home in Khayelitsha when she is describing the food she is making to me.

Madison: yeah we prepare them we are, you see we are, how can I say, we are black people, we have sort of things like the eating manner like what they are goanna get at home so they must learn you see not going to eat all the luxury things they must know, they must behave themselves they must know this is food for our people, their cultural food, so we prepare them for home, to go home.<sup>129</sup>

This addresses both the issue of children who have known families that they are attempting to be reintegrated with and also the fact that eventually when the child is grown and a member of society they will need to be able to live together with others in the community. Madison also emphasises a need to be aware of the cultural differences, that there are specific manners and types of food that are expected. Sylvia talks about the same things when she discusses etiquette, and it is similar to the issue described by the Sister at Nazareth house where the children were becoming like little nuns.<sup>130</sup> The issue of little nuns at Nazareth House was that children did not have the ability to play with other children in the communities they were from, they did not like the food they were offered, and in general they could not interact, even to the point that they lost the use of their mother tongues.

Conflicts that arise between the ideology of a faith based organisation and society are large are typically small items. There are however times when there is a rift between the ideologies of these different groups that is substantial and needs serious attention. One example of this occurred when Theresa, the founder and operator of a faith based organisation refused to surrender the children in her care for adoption by homosexual couples. This created a serious problem as it was interpreted as discrimination based on sexual orientation. These were couples that had been cleared by social services as acceptable adoption parents and the organisation was not cooperating. The organisation's and Theresa's stance was that homosexuality is immoral and unacceptable according to Christian belief and that they would not submit a child to be raised by homosexuals. In this incident the faith based organisation kept the child and the reaction of the couple is unknown. Since then social services has avoided attempting to place children from that organisation with homosexual couples, however it remains as an unofficial understanding between the social workers and the organisation, and officially is a black mark against the organisation.<sup>131</sup>

Another example of operational conflict between faith based organisations and secular society is the difference in attitudes towards discipline. One of the Islamic shelters that was studied has a list of consequences for misbehaviour which some would think border on abuse.

*Seraj: yeah we've got a, what I do every six months, we sit down and we say look, we need to work out punishments for certain things. Late for transport in the morning for school what is the punishment? And they would tell me what they want. What is the punishment? 15 rand fine, they all have a savings account when it's their birthday, or they do odd jobs here and there like they work for a catering company, the bigger ones, earn money that we put under their savings, so they break a florescent light or they break a window at school or something um or like for fines we deduct from the savings so they are very scared not to have money deducted from the savings. However where is my file?.... that's their names, surnames, January February March April that's the amount of money that that person has saved thus far, yeah then you see minuses that is for being fined for doing something naughty. They try very hard to work it into a plus figure. At the prize giving we read this out and the people will applaud them, but if you read that minus then they don't like it, so they work very hard to put something back in it, not to get fined again, so that's one of the ways that we can discipline, late for transport 15rand fine, swearing 3 chillies, Me: chillies?
Seraj: 3 chillies, you eat three chillies, if your caught smoking you eat a packet of cigarettes in front of everybody that's the rules, they provide rules<sup>132</sup>*

Some of these are relatively minor, fines for small infractions, but the eating of chillies of a packet of cigarettes pushes that would be considered appropriate by many. I was also told about the 'punch' which is used as a form of discipline. A combination of vinegar, salt and spices, mostly chilli apparently, is mixed and there are a certain number of glasses to be drunk as punishment, depending on the infraction. Seraj further describes some aspects of physical punishment which, though not cruel per say would certainly be criticised by Social Services if it were made commonly known.

Seraj: one thing... fighting here and there if you, like for instance if you like smack me and you come tell that person that smacked you then that person must smack you 120 times.

Me: so if I smack...

Seraj: if you smack me you smack me I come tell, tell me or mommy that you smacked me then I will call you in did you smack him or her, you smack it. It is the ones there is no fighting no hitting, then you give 120.<sup>133</sup>

This discipline is certainly unusual to western views and they are aware of this at the shelter. It is however viewed as being appropriate by the organisation. As Seraj emphasises ‘they provide the rules.’ They are also aware that physical discipline is not permitted legally and are dismissive of this fact. In a conversation about manners and education Sylvia noted that she believes she is doing the correct thing if she strikes the child

S: yes they are, I think it's only the madrasah or the religion school tutors, they are salaried people but everybody else does a pure voluntary basis, now my dad also comes here. My dad takes an afternoon class and he then sits with the adolescence and he also teaches them etiquette. Because him and I are quite fanatical about the way children eat and their habits in respect to old people and when they hear me they now they tell me that's your dad speaking because I believe that there is a manner in which to eat. The one boy was slouching he actually was leaning over this way while we were having supper and he must just sit up straight. I says to him so what what this story about laying he said you know I was tired, I said what about the manners of eating, what about the little ones they are going to copy you because they think that's cool. I told him if I ever see you doing that again you're going to get a tap against you head, he knows that I do because I don't, I'm not shy with my hand and I tell him you go take me to social services but I believe the old way is the best way. And they um they listen to me 90% of the time, I don't have problems with them.<sup>134</sup>

We see with her reference to social services awareness that this sort of discipline is not considered acceptable, but this is mitigated by the belief that the traditional ways of raising children are superior. This echoes Madison's sentiments that when she was young there was more discipline that you didn't misbehave because you knew there were consequences. It also expresses the awareness of cultural differences and a need to educate children in not only western etiquette and culture, but that of their own people.

The conflicts which arise between faith based organisations ideals and the secular society within which they operate illustrate some of the ways in which religion and religiosity of the staff can drastically influence faith based organisations' interactions with the world around it. It shows some of the ways in which a faith based organisation not only positions itself, but is positioned by its actions.

Chapter 7 Conclusions

I personally am not a religious man. I was raised in a culture that is nominally Christian, though I have not been baptised, nor do I adhere to any of the observances beyond the national statutory holidays of Christmas, Easter, St Patrick's Day and St Jean-Baptise Day. I am not a member of any religious group or organisation; I do not attend religious ceremonies other than weddings and funerals, and those I attend without regards the religion associated; I do not believe in a god, nor do I believe that individuals can have a preordained purpose in life. Yet despite my scepticism, or perhaps because of it, I came to study faith based organisations and the ways in which religion or religiosity motivates people to work in children's social welfare. My assumption was that I would find that religion provided substantial motivation to those that worked with children, that there would be a clear cut and obvious correlation between 'God says' and 'I do.' As with everything in life, it is never that simple; my findings do support that religion plays a significant role in motivation people towards caring for children and in keeping them going in the face of challenges. It has also become apparent that there are other factors that contribute, ranging from personal childhood experiences, to cultural norms, to feelings of being a mother and of wanting to help.

This research has been about, in the simplest of terms, motive. Everything here leads up to the ultimate question of why do people get out of bed in the morning and do the things that they do, be it care for the 6 foster children in their house, run the shelter for street boys, counsel runaway girls or deal with the daily routines of managing a non-government organisation in Cape Town and all the details that accompany such a job. I have approached the question of motive and the way that religion serves to motivate behaviour from three main angles. As discussed these are 1) the role that faith/religiosity plays in the personal motives and reasons for working in children's social welfare, 2) how religious ideology has influenced the actions and positions of faith based organisations in children's social welfare, and finally 3) the ways in which faith based organisations position themselves within these structures, both for internal reasons of belief and for external factors like donor reaction and community relations. But the question of motive needs to go further than these topics. As I suggested at the beginning of this paragraph, it is about what gets people out of bed on a daily basis to continue very difficult and challenging jobs.

In the preceding 6 chapters I have outlined some theory, discussed my methodology, presented my findings and discussed how they show the motivating factors in individuals' choice to work in children's social welfare. Here I aim to draw together these disparate discussions and show how religious belief motivates these individuals over the long term to continually persist in this work, to continue to try and help children in the face of the many challenges that they encounter. This will be a discussion of some of my own personal experiences while conducting this research, of the people who I have studied and interviewed during this time, and of how the abstract and theoretical religious beliefs of people manifest into real world actions.

The clearest example I can present is Seraj at Vision Children's Home. This Islamic children's home runs its daily routine based directly on the teachings of the Qur'an. It was founded because it is a sin for a Muslim to know of another Muslim who is in need and living a non-halal life and not help if they are able. The children therein adhere to a strict halal lifestyle and observe all religious obligations. They are raised by Muslims to be good Muslims, because that is what Islam requires. To be sure, there are rewards for caring for orphans, and of course not all Muslims are opening and caring for orphans or other Muslims in need, so the individuals who do are also caring and passionate people above and beyond being Muslim. Beyond the reasoning behind why he began and runs a children's home, Seraj relies heavily on belief for the routine running of the place. He prays for guidance as to what he should do, and that he should be able to continue his work. He believes completely that what he needs to continue will be provided if he remains faithful, and that if he doesn't get what he thought he needed, he was obviously wrong. And the world seems to have an uncanny way of supporting this belief, Seraj can recite dozens of occasions when there was something in particular, something urgent that needed to be addressed, and by the will of Allah a donor appears or an opportunity arises seemingly from nowhere that solves the problem. Thus belief is reinforced and continues; because he is faithful and lives by certain rules, and cares for children well, he is enabled to continue to do so. As one of the volunteers who work with him told me of Seraj that "if they were to come down tomorrow and tell him Mr. Jackson we're going to close you he would tell them yes and when they turn their back then the children will just come in by the back door he won't see anybody be turned away."<sup>135</sup> Further, Seraj uses the structures provided by the religious community to continue his work. His involvement of local religious leaders and the Mosques in fundraising and social activities for the children provide the structure to enable him to keep Vision running.

<sup>135</sup> Interview: March 19/08: Sylvia at Vision Shelter. Muslim woman in her early 40's, educated as a social worker and a volunteer during the evenings with Vision

Julia from Home from Home is a great example of religion providing persistent motivation. She began her non-government organisation in response to the closing of another non-government organisation which ran homes in Khayelitsha. She did this because she could not stand the idea that the good work that had been done there could become undone, she is also motivated on religious grounds, her Non-government organisation being a Christian faith based organisation which does promote Christian ideals, but where her case is interesting is that she is responsible for the children in her care. Julia brings home the difficulty in being the primary organiser of a non-government organisation

<sup>3</sup> the children so that way its heavy... and you can't escape it you can't think well
<sup>4</sup> do something else because this is my responsibility, you don't start something
<sup>5</sup> and then not follow it through, and there are no options... it doesn't mean I don't <sup>6</sup> believe what I am doing is really right, it just it takes its toll on me as a person.
<sup>7</sup> So can't fix everyone ... we have to get on with it so its its yeah... and there
<sup>8</sup> really are wonderful rewards to, when the children do well at school or are
<sup>9</sup> physically well or parties or something exciting happens so there's a lovely side
<sup>10</sup> to it all to and also working now with different organisation meeting wonderful
<sup>12</sup> feeds the bit where I worry at night all the time and the other side is good<sup>136</sup>

There are a few very interesting aspects to what Julia is saying here. On line 3 she refers to being unable to escape, that she cannot take up other projects because she has taken on this responsibility. This reflects a compulsion to continue the task, a need to persist that is very strong but also the sense of responsibility is one of virtue, a value repeated later on line 6 where she states that she believes what she is doing is really right. More than values, Julia talks about the feelings and emotions that come up in doing this type of work. Line 8 refers to ‘wonderful rewards,’ line 9 about the ‘lovely side,’ line 11 about it being ‘exciting,’ line 12 about the ‘worry at night’ and also that ‘the other side is good.’ So a part of Julia’s motivation and persistence comes from a sense of duty, of responsibility for the task taken on, but there is also an emotional side to what motivates her to continue in this work, the feeling of being virtuous and of positive feelings from her work.

---

<sup>136</sup> Life History: June 30/08. Julia from Home from Home: Middle aged woman of English origin, social worker and founder of Home from Home, based in Wynberg head office and a number of settlements, particularly Khayelitsha

There are when there is a lot of stress and she wonders why she continues, but she attributes to her Roman Catholic upbringing a penchant for doing ‘what’s right’ regardless of whether it is good for you.

<sup>2</sup> very stressful, we question time and time again what the hell were doing but you
<sup>3</sup> do it because you know it’s right so and also think a sense probably from my
<sup>5</sup> whether its ok for you... I don’t know if you know much about the catholic faith <sup>6</sup> and how we are... yeah so we do things sometimes that are... if you stop and
<sup>7</sup> think about it its destructive so you just do what you feel is right and it makes us
<sup>8</sup> feel good, or makes me feel good I suppose<sup>137</sup>

So we see again a direct link to religion and continued altruistic behaviour. Not the explicit way in which Seraj seems to experience it, but still a strong impulse, and one that Julia is aware of. She knows that she could possibly be more financially successful with far less stress in another sector, yet continues her ‘good work’ because it is the right thing to do and it makes her ‘feel good.’ On line 4 we see that she ascribes her motivation directly by her beliefs in ‘doing what’s right’, and continues her work both from a sense of duty towards the project that she has started. Line 5 through 8 she talks about a catholic culture of doing right regardless of if it is wrong for yourself, give her understanding that it is a catholic ethos and her religious belief that doing the right thing should be done regardless of challenges or problems that it present to oneself.

A visual representation of the cycle I am describing here would look something like this:

The starting point is belief. Belief can directly influence action as we saw with the example of Seraj and his work at Vision Children’s home, or it can bring up emotions which push them to action. The emotions in question can be complex, in some cases guilt or shame about the conditions of others, in some cases dissatisfaction with one’s own life, in some cases a strong sense of empathy for the suffering or situations of others. These actions then reinforce both the positive emotions, the idea of ‘feeling good’ and also give the actor a sense of virtue, of not only feeling good but of having ‘done good’, or of ‘being good.’ These positive emotional and virtuous feedbacks reinforce the beliefs that resulted in the initial behaviour and encourage another repetition of the cycle.

Christy prays each day when she gets up. She prays before she goes to bed. She prays for strength when work is difficult; she prayed for guidance to accept her job as director of a children's shelter; she prays for the children in her care. Christy knew from a young age that she was interested in social work. She studied it at university, she worked for the government in Grahamstown when she graduated, and she moved to Homestead when she wanted to return to Cape Town after the death of her father. The process by which she came to be working in CSW was not direct, she did not experience a calling or particularly strong desire to work with children in particular, but it presented as an opportunity. However the thing that comes across most strongly when talking to Christy is that she not only truly believes in what she is doing and cares deeply for the children in her care, but that it is with god's help that she is able to continue. She is fond of the scripture 'The lord won't test you beyond what you can achieve' and frequently refers to god in conversation, reflecting her belief and reliance on strength from god. The most pertinent aspect of Christy's belief and involvement with religion are her statements that she believes god gives her the strength to continue doing this work. When things are particularly difficult, when the children are being ungrateful, or when the work load is out of control Christy prays and asks for strength, it is her belief that sustains her over the long term and allows her to deal with the present. Her own pattern of belief/action/reaction is slightly different from the one described above. It was not her beliefs that brought her to work in children's social welfare, but rather her beliefs are what sustain her in the daily routine. She relies on the positive feedback that she receives from acting in a manner in line with her beliefs, the sense of virtue and the positive emotional response to doing the work to offset the negative aspects of her work.

Madison also finds the strength to continue to do her work through her belief. As a woman who runs a foster home with six children, she has an incredibly busy day. She typically gets up early to prepare the children's breakfast and get them ready for school. She spends the day cleaning, preparing lunch, doing laundry, preparing supper, working with the children to do their schoolwork and getting the children to bed. She has little time for herself or her own needs, often finishes working late in the evening. She talks about working late, showing me a pile of laundry and saying “You see when they sleeping and there’s no time there’s no rest you see thins bundle I must do it at night you see I mean I must pack them in their drawers and then I pray and go sleep there ten o’clock.” Madison uses her belief in a manner not dissimilar from Christy. It gives her strength to continue and keep working. It also forms an important component of her life in that it makes up part of her daily routine, that even after a long day of work she takes the time to pray before bed demonstrates its importance for her.

These examples illustrate the interplay between religion and belief and the routine daily actions of the individuals in question. As was expected, belief acts as the main motivation that causes these people to continue their daily routines, to act for the benefit of the children over and over again. It can be as direct as the ‘God Says’ therefore ‘I Do,’ or it can a more subtle interplay between beliefs, empathy, emotions and ideas of virtue and ‘doing right’ that cause and reinforce the desire to help others and to work with children in this sense. That so many of the people found working in this field have strong religious beliefs regardless of whether they are working with faith based organisations or secular ones only further proves that it is these religious beliefs that spurs individuals into these altruistic behaviours and actions.

Appendix 1: Interview Guidelines

Semi Structured Interviews Towards an understanding Children's social welfare

Basic Background information desired

- A/S/L (Age, Sex, Location)
- Name and nick name?
- Phone, email, contact person
- Origin (ethnic and cultural/geographical)
- Current residence
- Occupation (rather ask at the below section about how they began to do what they are doing now...)
- Religious Background (Specifically raised as?) would not ask for background rather ask – is religion important for you? This allows them to answer much more openly

List of possible interview question:

- 1) Where did you grow up?
- 2) Where was your family from originally?
- 3) How did you come to be in Cape Town?
- 4) When you were growing up can you remember if there was anyone taking care of children the way you are now?
- 5) Tell me a little about the place you grew up?
- 6) And when was that?
- 7) What was it like growing up in _____ during the _____?
  - a. With (Whatever interesting information I may have gleaned by now)
- 8) Are you a mother (or father)?
  - a. What does being a mother (father) mean for you?
- 9) Did you always plan to have a family?
- 10) How is it that you came to care for other children?
  - a. Did you make that choice yourself?

- b. How old were you when you first started taking care of children?
- 11) How did all of this come about (indicating to orphanage)? What was the progression from the beginning to where you are now?
- a. Have any of your children moved on?
  - b. How long do children usually stay with you?
  - c. Do things often happen the same way with the kids, or is it different every time?
- 12) Can you tell me about the first time you worked with children?
- a. How did it come about?
  - b. What happened?
  - c. Was it difficult?
  - d. Has it gotten easier to take in children with time?
- 13) Where do you find the children, or how do they find you?
- a. What is the background of x, y, z? (Pick a few children)
  - b. Is there a common theme to the children's situations, or do they come from a variety of backgrounds?
- 14) How do you manage to keep this place running?
- a. Who cooks, what do you usually feed the kids?
  - b. Who takes care of the cleaning?
  - c. Who watches the children? Is there some sort of instruction or structure to their day?
- 15) Does the government give you any support for what you're doing?
- a. Do they give you any problems?
- 16) How about the local community? Are there people from around here who have helped you in raising the children? Who?
- 17) What do your neighbours think of what you're doing?
- 18) How has fostering and working with children changed in the time since '94
- 19) Would you take any child that came to you?
- 20) Do you seek to get the children in you care adopted?
- 21) What differences do you see between fostering children and arranging for their adoption?
- 22) What about the idea of raising children and a child's sense of Identity

- 23) What do you think about the current fashion in international adoption?
- 24) Madonna and her Malawian child?

General Themes to be discussed: (These are not questions as such, but general areas of conversation)

- How do children find you / get to you?
- Where, or what background, are they coming from?
- Relationship with others in the area who foster
- Relationship with the community support as well as conflict
- Family? Have their own children and relationships with them
- How did you first start fostering children?
  - o Was it something you decided to do?
  - o When you started did you think you were only taking in a kid or two
  - o What was it like when the very first kid arrived at your home? Tell me about that day.
- Most memorable / interesting / tragic stories
- Self reported motives for fostering.
  - o Personal Motives
  - o Religious Motives
  - o Social / Cultural indicators
- How do you run your place?
  - o Community Support?
  - o Gov't Assistance?
  - o Church / Temple / Mosque / Religious Organizations?
  - o Other foster homes and the interrelations between them (I suspect this is critical)
- Nature of children fostered
  - o What makes a child an orphan, or eligible for fostering? (Madonna) (Abuse)

- In an African context, or an Indian (or whoever I'm talking to), how is it possible to not have relatives to take you in? (This is the kind of situation where I would be tailoring my questions to the particular context of my informant, be they Hindu, coloured, Zulu, or whatever. It is most likely that I would refer to specific neighbourhoods rather than a particular ethnicity because the two often, but not always, have an explicit correlation.
- Geographical or cultural (tribal?) Origin of children. Once again, I'm looking to see if there is a prevalence of 'taking care of one's own'
- Racial/Cultural aspect of fostered children

Appendix 2: Consent Forms (Recording, Secondary, General)

Recording:

I/We _____ agree to participate in the research as it has been explained to me by Andrew Lipinski, and to allow Mr. Lipinski access to my/our home, or facility where observations will be made regarding the activities and behaviours of the foster carers, the children, and others who are present. His research and activities are to be explained to those who are present and their verbal consent to be involved must be given if Mr. Lipinski is to use information gathered regarding that specific individual.

I/We understand that these observations are to become the property of Mr. Lipinski and that they will be kept confidential and that appropriate measures will be taken to insure that they will not be accessible to others in a format that could identify me/us or my/our affiliations.

I/We agree to this research based on the understanding that:

- 1) My/Our participation is entirely voluntary; I/We may withdraw at any time, without penalty.
- 2) My/ Our privacy will be respected at all times, no one besides Mr. Lipinski will be able to associate any data collected regarding me/us or my/ our activities back to me. Confidentiality is of primary concern.
- 3) At no time will any of the data collected be passed onto any other organisations.
- 4) I/We may request to see the data that has been collected regarding me/us and my/our activities, as well as being entitled to a copy of the final incarnation of this research. Data regarding other participants is of course confidential, and thus will not be made available.

General:

This research is regarding the reasons and motives that people have for fostering children as well as, where possible, the means by which they are able to foster. I am focusing primarily on people who foster children who are not related to them, through faith based initiatives.

The purpose of this research is to develop an understanding of 1) why it is, or what encourages people to foster children who are not related to them, and 2) how are they able to manage fostering multiple children?

I am approaching you in the hope that you will be willing to participate in my research. I am interested in you because of your involvement with an individual or organisation that is 1) fostering children not related to them, 2) fostering within the system and structures put in place by the government, and 3) affiliated with one of the faith based organizations that I am working with.

This research will consist of allowing me to observe the daily functioning of your home or facility, as well as conducting one (1) or more interviews with you. Your participation is voluntary, and you can withdraw at any point. The interviews will take approximately 2 hours each.

This research is conducted towards the completion of the research report portion of a Master's degree in Arts, Discipline of Anthropology, at the University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg. It is conducted with the knowledge and approval of the university.

Should you choose to participate in this research the following information is important for you to know:

- 1) Your participation is entirely voluntary; you may withdraw at any time, without penalty.
- 2) Your privacy will be respected at all times, no one besides myself will be able to associate any data collected regarding you or your activities back to you. Confidentiality is of primary concern.
- 3) At no time will any of the data collected be passed onto any other organisations.
- 4) You may request to see the data that I have collected regarding you and your activities, as well as being entitled to a copy of the final incarnation of this research. Data regarding other participants is of course confidential, and thus not available to you.
